The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford based his assumptions about Labour policies on that doubtful document by two Americans, yet there has not been a success story in America for the vast majority of the people. Under Reagan, the tax burden was shifted from the rich to the poor. A study by the Urban Institute, whose members include prominent Republicans as well as Democrats, showed that, between 1980 and 1984, the poorest 20 per cent. of the population suffered a 7·6 per cent. decrease in disposable income, the next 20 per cent. up the scale suffered a decrease of 1·7 per cent. and the 20 per cent. at the top of the scale increased their income by 8·7 per cent. It is worth mentioning what has happened in America because much of what the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford said was based on the Credit Suisse /First Boston report.

Mr. Hanley: If the hon. Lady is denying what my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford and I said, which we believe to be the fruits of research into what the Labour party has told us about its policies so far, will she tell us what Labour's income tax policies are? We are waiting to hear if our research has been proved wrong.

Mrs. Mahon: If the hon. Gentleman is patient, he might hear something that will do him some good.

In America, similar policies of reducing taxes to reward the rich led to problems similar to those in the United Kingdom. Nobody denies that the Americans invested the millions that they received from tax cuts, as did the wealthy in Britain, but in neither case did they invest in wealth-producing assets. They went for short, speculative gains, which have not done either country any good.

The trickle-down approach in America failed just as spectacularly as it did in this country. We all remember President Bush's election pledge:

"Watch my lips—no new taxes."

He is now faced with a projected federal deficit of more than $150 billion. He has recently signalled that he intends to preside over a budget reduction package that will include taxes, despite all that we heard during the run-up to the election—unless he again gets away with watering down the Gramm-Rudman Act, which would enable him legally to introduce an even larger budget.

The hon. Members for Hertford and Stortford and for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) should concentrate on the Government's taxation record before taking to task those trying to put forward a fair programme of taxation. We believe in taxation because we believe in the redistribution of wealth. We certainly would not have introduced the poll tax. Hon. Members should deal with that issue, but they do not want to talk about it. They should think about the high interest rates that the Government are using as a one-club weapon to avoid tax increases. That has harmed economic activity. Manufacturing in my constituency is suffering because firms cannot afford to borrow with the cost of money being so high.

Conservative Members should concentrate on the skills shortage and the crisis in education. They should concentrate their minds also on the explosion of poverty. They may be proud of their tax policies, but the poor and those on low incomes are not happy with Tory tax policies. The Labour party is proud of its policy review and its aims. I am sure that we will have magnificent achievements. My right hon. and hon. Friends will propose policies that will be properly costed, and the electorate will believe them.

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) on securing this debate, on his excellent motion, and on the superb speech with which he introduced it and with which he demolished the Labour party's tax programme. The debate has been embellished by contributions from my hon. Friends the Members, for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow). Their speeches, together with that of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford, will merit reading and re-reading throughout the country.

It was a generous idea to give the Opposition the opportunity to explain their policies. They have had that opportunity, but so far they have refused to take it. Labour Members have not once explained their party's tax policies. It is manifest that they are ashamed of them. They have exercised their right of silence for fear of incriminating themselves, and we well understand why. We shall have to wait to hear whether the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) will continue that policy. It is noteworthy that he is saving his speech until the end of the debate so that there will be no opportunity to comment on it.

The Government have always made clear the principles on which our tax policy is based. Our record of implementation demonstrates them in action and we have set clear targets for the future. Our principles are to reform taxes so that they are simpler; to remove unwarranted reliefs; to plug loopholes; to broaden the tax base; and ultimately to reduce marginal rates because they affect economic activity. Our record demonstrates a successful reform of the taxation of companies, of personal income, of capital, of inheritance, of husbands and wives and of savings. We have abolished seven major taxes and several minor ones. Our targets are progressively to reduce the burden of public spending and thereby tax as a share of national income, and to reduce the all-important basic rate of income tax to 20p as and when it is prudent to do so.

The Labour party is under an even greater obligation than we are to spell out its tax policies because they will impose an increased burden. People have the right to know how much extra tax they will have to pay, who will pay it, which taxes will be raised and what new taxes will be introduced. That obligation is recognised by many Opposition Members who have been distinctly unhappy with the evasiveness of their Front-Bench spokesmen during recent months. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) made it an issue in the deputy leadership election little more than a year ago. He said:

"We must learn the lesson from the last election when our tax policy was a mess. It is not credible for Labour to suggest our policies can be financed on a programme of low taxation. It can't and the electorate know it can't. We need to argue our case not duck the issues."

We shall learn later whether the Front-Bench spokesman argues the case or ducks the issue. I fear that the Opposition will continue to take as their motto, "Mum's the word." Indeed, they became quite angry on Second Reading of the Finance Bill when I suggested that those in the press who criticise Treasury Ministers for going into pre-Budget purdah might direct their fire at the Labour party for going into post-Budget purdah. However, they seem determined to remain there, at least until the next election.

Because the Opposition are not very forthcoming, we have the right to reconstruct, from the evidence available, the tax policies that it appears they will introduce. We can draw on three sources of evidence—first, their policy statements made before they went into pre-election purdah; secondly, their voting records on tax changes over the last decade; and, thirdly, their record when in government. Those sources combine to paint a clear picture of a party committed to high spending, requiring high taxation that will mean most people on average incomes and above paying more, and that will impose significantly higher marginal tax rates on a substantial minority.

Let us consider some of the Opposition's specific proposals—and we must make no bones about this—for tax changes. They include the upper earnings limit, investment income surcharge, the higher rate of income tax and the basic rate of income tax. The first proposal is to abolish the upper earnings limit on national insurance contributions and impose a 9 per cent. tax surcharge on 3 million people on all incomes above £18,000 a year. In his article in the Independent on Sunday,—which I commend to my hon. Friends—the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) was frank about that. He said:

"They say 'you are going to hit people earning about £18,000 by making them pay this extra amount'. I say 'Yes I am'."

There is no reason to doubt the right hon. and learned Gentleman's word. A party that has as a central revenue-raising item a surcharge on employers' national insurance contributions—the notorious tax on jobs that my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe) had the privilege of abolishing—would have no compunction about abolishing the upper earnings limit.

The second proposal is the restoration of a special supplementary tax on savings—the investment income surcharge that was also abolished by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Surrey, East. There is some doubt whether the plan is to restore a 15 per cent. surcharge, as previously existed, or to impose a 9 per cent. charge on all savings income—the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East is nodding—mirroring national insurance contributions. The Opposition voted against the abolition of the 15 per cent. surcharge, but it appears that a 9 per cent. tax on all 20 million savers who pay tax is now in vogue. Either way, it will be a tax on savings when we need more savings, not less.

It would bear most heavily on the elderly, retired, and those who would suffer most from the effect of Labour's inflationary policies in wiping out their lifetime savings.

As to the top rate of income tax, on a number of occasions, Labour's spokesmen have affirmed that it would be raised to a maximum of 50p in the pound—or 59p in the pound including the national insurance surcharge. In his revealing interview in the Independent on Sunday, the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East described that rather menacingly as "an exercise in moderation."

It is not clear why anyone should rely on Labour's promise not to raise tax rates if it came to power. I wonder whether the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), who called for redistribution, believes that a top tax rate of 50p in the pound is high enough.

Mr. Tony Banks: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lilley: Of course I will give way—my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) set an example.

Mr. Banks: It was a fine example to follow. I may say to the young Minister that it is all very well Conservative Members complaining about the Labour party not spelling out what it intends to do, but when my right hon. and learned Friend the shadow Chancellor does exactly that, Conservative Members will respond, "We do not believe what you say." We cannot win in that situation, can we?

Mr. Lilley: There is some suspicion, because Labour's voting record in Parliament indicates otherwise. Labour Members voted not only against the reduction of the top rate of income tax from 60p to 40p, but from 83p to 60p. Labour's record in government, too, belies the "exercise in moderation" to which the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East referred. When in government, Labour raised the top rate of tax from 75p to 83p, and the overall top rate was increased to 98p in the pound, on income from savings. Labour deliberately took that action, to "squeeze the rich until the pips squeak"—to use the inelegant words of the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey).

Mr. Nicholas Brown: Is it the Financial Secretary's view that the entire process of Labour's policy review was just some kind of charade, for the purpose of presenting a pleasant face to the electorate, and that we do not mean a word of it? If that is the Minister's view, he should say so, rather than just imply that it is.

Mr. Lilley: There is an element of charade in Labour's policy review, and there is an important reason for some doubts lingering in the minds of not only my right hon. and hon. Friends but of people in the country at large, as to whether the conversion of the Labour party is sincere. The reason for those doubts is that Labour has never admitted that it was wrong. There is more joy in heaven over one sinner who repents than at 99 just men who need no repentance. Never has a Labour Member stood up and said, "We were wrong. We are sorry. We have changed, and we now have a different policy." Until Labour disowns both its voting record and its record in government, doubts must remain about the policies that it presents.

I would expect any changed policy to be accompanied by a recognition that the previous policy was wrong. However, if Labour maintains a dual allegiance to its previous record and to its new, temporary policies concocted before a general election, it must expect the man in the street to hold some suspicions.

When Labour was in power, it deliberately raised top rates of tax, but not, it would seem, to acquire a great deal of extra revenue. The consequence of that action was that the top 5 per cent. of this country's richest people, who at the beginning of Labour's period of office paid 29 per cent. of our income tax revenues, paid only 24 per cent. of them by the end of Labour's term of office. That is scarcely in tune with the redistributive aims of at least the hon. Member for Halifax.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I do not know where the Minister got his brief, but he is wandering about all over the place. I wonder whether he holds constituency surgeries, as do I and my right hon. and hon. Friends. I held a surgery on Saturday, and people came in to complain about the taxes that they have to pay, even when they are in a very low income group. I could cry at some of the problems that they have as a consequence of the present Administration. The Minister keeps harping on about what Labour's policy will be if it gets into power. Don't worry, lad. Labour will get in next time. When it does, taxes will be based on people's ability to pay. That is what it is all about—so let the Minister put that in his pipe and smoke it.

Mr. Lilley: I am grateful for that constructive contribution from the hon. Gentleman, who has just wandered in.

The main issue affecting both the hon. Gentleman's constituents and mine is not the top rate of income tax, which falls directly upon no more than 1·7 million people, but the basic rate. Neither Labour's policy review nor the statements of Opposition figures give clear guidance. My hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford made clear, as did my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes, the conflicting statements made by Opposition Members. If today's debate serves any purpose, it is to achieve clarification from Opposition Members as to whether it is Labour's intention to raise the basic rate of income tax.

The right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East acknowledged in his recent interview that the tax reforms he proposes will not be "revenue-neutral." He was clear about that. The right hon. and learned Gentleman admits that the yield from implementing just one of them would be absorbed by just one of Labour's pledges. We have yet to see the Opposition spell out and cost all their pledges. They promised to do so in the foreword to the very document that the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East suggested as a reliable guide. But the shadow Chief Secretary has said that she disowns the promise made by the Leader of the Opposition in his foreword to cost Labour's policies before the general election. Labour has now gone back on that promise and said that it will not cost them until afterwards. That is another reason why we have doubts about the reliability of Labour's spokesmen.

[Mr. Lilley]

In the absence of clear statements by members of the Opposition Front Bench, and as they have not taken the opportunity today to stand up and say whether they will raise the basic rate, we must refer again to Labour's voting record and its record in government. The voting record of Labour Members is clear. They voted against every cut in the basic rate that we have introduced in this and previous Parliaments. They voted against a reduction from 33 per cent. to 30 per cent. in 1979; 30 per cent. to 29 per cent. in 1986; 29 per cent. to 27 per cent. in 1987; and 27 per cent. to 25 per cent. in 1988. On each occasion, the Opposition said that they would prefer to use potential revenues from income tax to increase public spending.

One can believe that, because one knows that that is where Opposition hearts lie. When in government, and after some ups and downs, Labour ended up with a basic tax rate 3p higher than that which applied when they were first elected. If we were simply to uprate in line with inflation the tax allowances that Labour left behind for a Conservative Government, and if we had maintained the same tax rates, the average man would be paying over £1,000 a year more income tax.

That underestimates the true burden of public expenditure under Labour. A large part of its programme was financed not by tax but by borrowing. Borrowing is nothing more than deferred taxation. The equivalent value today of the deferred tax burden that Labour was incurring, year in and year out, was equivalent to about £2,000 per household in the last year of that Labour Government.

Mr. Tony Banks: That is what one borrows money for.

Mr. Lilley: I am afraid that it is not as simple as the hon. Member for Newham, North-East suggests—[Interruption.] I meant to say Newham, North-West.

Mr. Banks: I hope that the Minister's economics are better than his geography.

Mr. Simon Coombs (Swindon): Will my hon. Friend confirm that, such was the Labour Government's inability to control public expenditure, that in 1976, although they raised personal and corporate taxes significantly that year, they had begun the year by assuming that the public sector borrowing requirement would be £2·7 billion? As it turned out, by the end of the year the PSBR had reached £9 billion.

Mr. Lilley: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is difficult to forecast the public sector borrowing requirement, but happily we often make the mistake of underestimating our surpluses.

The overall impact of the Labour party's policies is clear: a higher burden of taxation, higher taxation of the average man in the street and, most of all, a substantial increase in marginal tax rates for large numbers of people. At last we know what supply side socialism means. It is the exact opposite of what the rest of the world did during the supply side revolution of the 1980s. During that period, countries from India to America, from Japan to the Ivory Coast, reduced their top rates of tax and their rates of tax generally because they believed that marginal rates of tax were important for efficiency, growth and the prosperity of the economy.

Mr. Battle: If the result of this week's meeting is that Congress and the President of the United States decide to do a U-turn and raise taxes to fund the trade and budget deficit, will the Government here do likewise?

Mr. Lilley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that point; it reinforces what I said earlier. We had to raise the tax burden to deal with the deficit that we inherited from Labour. I do not intend to comment on the United States Government's predicament. If, however, the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that deficits cannot be sustained and have to be financed, there is a great deal of force in what he says.

The hon. Gentleman's colleagues do not seem to recognise the damage that can be done by high rates of tax, not just to individuals but to the health of the economy as a whole. The Labour party specifically denies that they cause damage. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) said:

"I find that there is no respectable evidence . . . There is nothing at home or abroad that can justify the ideology of incentives"—[Official Report, 26 April 1988; Vol. 132, 231.]

That was said in the context of cutting the basic and the top rates of tax. The hon. Gentleman is happy to ignore the evidence of common sense and experience that has convinced the rest of the world that taxes must be reduced.

We are in competition with countries throughout the world that are endeavouring to reduce taxes. I do not believe that the electorate, both because of family budgets and their recognition of this country's needs, will vote for a party that is as committed as the Labour party clearly is to raising marginal tax rates and clobbering the British people, and therefore the British economy.

6.32 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): Like the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), I am grateful to the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for tabling his motion. I am sorry that he feels that he has been cheated twice. He feels that he has been cheated by the Labour party's headquarters in Walworth road, which seems to have provided him with a different copy of the policy review from the one that the rest of us have. If that is the reason why he has been misled, I am sorry. I am also sorry that he may have been cheated by his own party's Whips Office.

We respect the hon. Gentleman's views on the Third world and overseas aid. Given his special interests and his luck in the ballot, I should have thought that he would choose a subject for debate that related to the Third world and overseas aid. This is a partisan motion. Nevertheless, it has provided me with an opportunity to respond to the matter of substance. I did not expect to have such an opportunity until after the next general election.

The motion has no ground in fact. It is the sort of contemptible motion that one associates with Liberal party councillors. It suggests that the Labour party is committed to "massive increases in public expenditure".

I do not know why the hon. Gentleman believes that public expenditure increases would be massive. Many Opposition Members believe that there ought to be substantial increases in public expenditure, but we are not committed to them, because we know that they cannot be achieved.

The motion states that the Labour party would impose "new taxes on savings, jobs and property".

We do not intend to invent new taxes to cover any of those matters. We shall no doubt adjust the present tax rates, but we do not intend to introduce new taxes.

The motion goes on to say that the Labour party would increase the rates of income tax. That is a fair point; I shall have more to say about it later. However, the Labour party's policies will be directed at those who pay the top rates of income tax. Those who pay income tax at the standard rate have nothing to fear from our policies.

The motion goes on to state that the Labour party would increase national insurance. That is a bit rich, coming from the party that in 1979 suggested that it would do exactly the opposite and then increased the rate from 6·5 to 9 per cent. If we increased national insurance, it would be only a question of removing the ceiling. We do not suggest any further increase in national insurance charges. the policy review document suggests nothing of the sort.

The motion also says that the Labour party is refusing to reveal its plans for the basic rate of income tax and contrasts that with the Government's goal of basic rate of just 20p. When we set goals we are told that they are vague promises, that we should be unable to achieve them and that we are not to be believed. When the Government set goals and do not achieve them—some Conservative Back Benchers have said that they ought not to be achieved at the moment—that is laudable. Why are our goals derided as dishonest while the Government's goals are praised? It is unusual for the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford to be so partisan.

The motion goes on to say that Labour

"will be forced substantially to increase the burden of tax on many lower and middle income earners."

We shall do nothing of the sort. Our taxation policies are designed to increase the wealth of the low-paid, not to diminish it. It is a bit rich for the Conservative party to say that, when only last Thursday it was condemned by the Social Services Committee, an all-party Committee, for having produced misleading statistics relating to those on low incomes. In its report the Select Committee said:

"It is now clear that those on lowest incomes gained least in the period 1981-85. We await with interest the publication of the new tables on Households Below Average Income to see whether this trend continued to 1987."

The blame lies with the Conservative Government. It is wrong for them to try to palm that off on us.

The motion

"notes that Labour plans run counter to the growing international consensus on the case for low taxes."

That is wrong. Our taxation policy is more in harmony with what is happening in Europe and among the developed countries of the world than the narrow and restrictive tax policies, with only two bands, that are being pursued by the Government. Only one person in 25 pays the top rate of income tax. For everyone else, regardless of their earnings up to the top rate threshold, there is only one rate of tax. That is not what happens in the rest of Europe and that is not what we propose. If criticism is to be directed at anyone, it ought to be directed at the hon. Gentleman's own party, not at the Labour party.

The motion also states that

"new taxes would stifle enterprise, drive firms and individuals abroad"— although we are trying to do exactly the opposite—

"and gravely weaken the wealth-creating capacity of the United Kingdom".

When one examines the recently published investment and growth figures, one realises that the Government ought not to direct such a charge at us. The motion also states that the Labour party would create unemployment. Our goal is exactly the opposite.

I intend to set out the Labour party's taxation policies and to deal with the matters of substance that have been referred to in the debate. Our taxation policies are set within the context of our overall economic and social programme. It would be bizarre if they were not. In the overall management of the economy, our objective is to achieve steady and balanced growth, to control inflation, to restore a reasonable equilibrium in the balance of payments and at the same time to sustain the highest possible levels of employment. Our taxation policies are designed to serve those ends. As well as being compatible with those overall economic objectives, our taxation policy is also compatible with the Labour party's social objectives. Our overriding social objective is fairness; by that we mean the redistribution of the tax burden from those least able to bear it to those most able to.

So it was fair of the hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford to say that some taxes will go up: so they will. For others, they will go down. The Labour party does not intend to divorce its taxation policy from its public spending programme, nor do we intend to undermine the role that taxation, direct and indirect, plays in the overall management of the British economy. Taxation will play its part in the achievement of the Labour party's overall economic objectives.

Before going on to give Conservative Back Benchers the details that they claim to crave, it would be helpful if I reiterated the statement on public spending made by my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) in the debate on public expenditure on 13 February:

"First, the Opposition reject the simplistic view that there is always, and in every circumstance, merit in reducing public spending as a percentage of national income . . . We are determined to make only the most limited of firm spending commitments—those that we must and can afford. Beyond that, we shall set out the direction of public investment and the priorities and choices of a Labour Government, emphasising throughout that we will not spend more than the country is earning or can prudently afford . . . Our priorities are clear: immediate relief for those who have suffered most —the pensioners and families with children—and the fostering of much-needed investment in our future".—[Official Report, 13 February 1990; Vol. 167, c. 178.]

Conservative Back Benchers ask what this is going to cost. In a special focus on meeting the challenge—Labour's economic policy—Goldman Sachs produced an analysis as follows:

"Thus the Labour Party has already committed itself to spending at least an additional £3·3 billion on improved pensions and child benefit in its first year of office."

I would not quarrel with those figures, which show the commitment implied in the two spending priorities.

Mr. Gow: I think I heard the hon. Gentleman say that a future Labour Government would not spend more than the country was earning. May we take it from that that it would not be the policy of a future Labour Government to have a public sector borrowing requirement?

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman implies that we should not borrow to pay for revenue expenditure. If, on the other hand, he suggests that we should not borrow for much-needed investment in the economy, with a clear return over time, I cannot give him the assurance that he seeks. If he is saying that we should not borrow to meet revenue commitments, he is following what I am saying most realistically. I hope that that is a good enough answer for him.

What I have said does not mean that the Labour party has no other spending priorities; Conservative Members have pointed out some of them. Of course we have—they are set out in our policy review documents and in statements by the relevant Opposition Front-Bench spokesmen for the shadow spending Ministries; but, as the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) pointed out, the real issue is how far an Opposition can go when making detailed public spending decisions and detailed decisions on taxation rates given that the economic circumstances that we shall have to face are not those that prevail now but will be those that prevail at the time of the next election.

The Labour party has set out its public spending priorities, beyond the two firm and clear commitments that my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South has given. Those priorities will take their place in the public spending round after the next Labour Government come to power. As long as our commitments are carefully costed and tightly controlled, there does not seem much point in conducting a hypothetical shadow public spending round at this stage. Our objectives are clearly stated and our timetable depends on the overall strength of the economy that we shall inherit from this Government after the next election.

If Conservative Members are reluctant to acquiesce in this approach, I have searched the archives to find information that will help me to convince them. I looked for an authority whom Conservative Back Benchers might respect, and failed, but I found some quotations from speeches made by the shadow Chancellor in 1979, before the last election. The right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe), now deputy Prime Minister, made a number of specific commitments on behalf of the Conservative Opposition at that time, and I am sure that it would interest the whole House if I reviewed them. After all, this debate is about the taxation policies of the Opposition, and it seems unnaturally restrictive to concentrate on the policies of the present Opposition—we ought to have a look at what the Conservatives were saying when they were in our position. They have no right to complain about that, because they are always harking back to the era of the previous Labour Government when they attack us. So we should review what the then shadow Chancellor said, if only as an awful warning to us all.

In his speech at Oxford on 7 April 1979, the then shadow Chancellor said:

"Every Labour Government puts taxes up . . . every Conservative Government gets taxes down. The next Conservative Government will be equally true to our record."

Of course, that was not true. Taxation as a share of gross domestic product has risen substantially under this Government. They inherited a rate of about 34 per cent.; since 1981 the gross tax take from the economy has been between 38 and 39 per cent.

Again in April of 1979, refuting charges made by the then Labour Government, the shadow Chancellor condemned what he called Labour's dishonesty. He said that there were "a number of inexcusable errors in Labour's televised party election broadcast on Friday, which I would like to correct."

He went on to say that the Conservatives had

"absolutely no intention of doubling VAT."

Granted, he held out for just over a year, but that was not quite the same as disclaiming any intention. I suppose that the lawyers might have got him out of that, but I doubt whether the electorate would have.

The shadow Chancellor also said:

"We do not claim to be able to work a miracle cure to solve all the problems of the economy . . . We want to raise living standards without stoking inflation."

That brings to mind the later objective of zero inflation, to which the Government of course said that they were committed. They did not add that they were going to put a 1 in front of the zero for the foreseeable future.

At his press conference on 18 April 1979 the shadow Chancellor said:

"The next Conservative Government will cut, and cut substantially, the basic and higher rates of income tax. We shall raise, and raise substantially, the level at which people start paying income tax."

It took nine years for him to honour that pledge to higher rate taxpayers; for lower rate taxpayers no mention was made of the 2·5 per cent. national insurance increase, which came much earlier than the tax cuts.

By 1982-83, the total tax burden had risen, not fallen. In Pentlands, the right hon. and learned Gentleman said:

"Creating secure jobs: the Conservative way . . . it's high time for a fresh approach, in Scotland as well as in the rest of the United Kingdom. The next Conservative Government will give Scotland that new approach. We must make sure the next five years are not as bad as the last."

The electorate in Scotland have delivered their own verdict on that.

Dealing with the pace of change and the pace at which commitments would be honoured, in an article in The Times of 13 August 1978, the shadow Chancellor said:

"I am very anxious to avoid the impression of the instant arrival with the instant decision and the instant solution. I know where I want to go and I am determined that we should go there at a steady pace."

The House will recognise that as authentic stuff. He continued:

"Of course we should want to alter the whole climate as soon as possible, not least because the benefits will be some time a-coming. That is why we are talking about three to four years."

When Labour hon. Members talk about the pace, Conservative hon. Members say that that is not allowable; however, they made precisely the same points when they were in opposition.

My right hon. and hon. Friends will no doubt ask, "Where did that policy all end? Where did the former shadow Chancellor's pledges get him?" By December 1980, Ian Aitken was writing under the headline

"Sir Geoffrey complains of being hampered by election pledges."

That report—in The Guardian in December 1980—said:

"The Chancellor of the Exchequer claimed last night that his mini-Budget was the direct result of pledges and commitments made by the Conservative party before and after the general election. He told sceptical Tory backbenchers that he now found himself, surrounded by road blocks created by these undertakings . . . he is understood to have told the private meeting that the Government was now 'pushed out against the frontiers of our pledges'."

It all ended in tears. By 1983, the financial section in The Guardian was saying in a leader article:

"how the Tories failed to keep their tax promises".

The article pointed out that wealth had not been redistributed in the way in which the Conservatives had said that they intended. That is an awful warning to those who make promises before general elections and cannot keep them afterwards. The Labour party has been careful about its detailed pledges—careful to ensure that it does not make any more promises than it can sustain. It is setting out a broader programme, which we hope to achieve if circumstances allow. It is right for us to do that.

The article in The Independent on Labour tax policies, to which reference has been made, sets out a number of charges under the headline

"Labour's half-baked conversion on tax".

The headline bears no relationship to the content of the article. One charge is that "The threshold for high-rate tax will no longer be raised in line with inflation, so that in real terms the starting point for higher tax will be lowered."

That is what the Government did in the previous Budget, and it is precisely what we have not said that we will do. In fact, we have not said where the tax bands will be placed.

We have set out our parameters carefully. We have said that the top rate of tax will be 50 per cent. It is right for Conservative Members to say that we have pledged to eliminate the national insurance threshold for people earning more than £30,000—or whatever the national insurance ceiling is. That will mean that some people are paying more. That change will take some people up to 59 per cent. That is the top rate of taxation that endured for the entirety of the chancellorship of the deputy leader of the Conservative party, and for most of the chancellorship of the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson). If is is such an iniquity to return to a rate that is only slightly less than that which endured for all that time, why did the Conservative party not rise up and insist that for most of the 1980s such a rate was reduced rather than sustained?

The hon. Member for Hertford and Stortford had a chance to move a motion on economic affairs. It is a poor and desperate attack that does not tell us anything, except about the people who launched it. Why do Conservative Members find it necessary to attack the Labour party for something that it is not going to do? After 10 years of Conservative government, why do they not try to show the party's economic achievements? Why do they not table a motion about the inflation rate, at 10 per cent.; about the growth rate forecast by the Government, at 1 per cent., which will put us bottom of the growth league; about the Government's forecast for negative growth in investment in the 1990s; about interest rates, praising the Government for the highest interest rates in Europe; about another Government record—the record trade deficit, which was £21 billion last year and last month the second highest ever, at £2·2 billion; about unemployment, which is now signposted for an upturn; about social justice, which is something not to be found in the Conservative party's tax policies; and, to top it all, why do we not have a motion about the electoral success of the poll tax and its widespread popularity?

Those are the real issues that are involved in the management of the economy. The Conservatives dare not have a debate in their own time about any of them, so they must attack us. They cannot even attack us fairly; they must do so unfairly, and on spurious grounds.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells) for giving us this opportunity to examine the vague and vacuous taxation policies of Her Majesty's Opposition. My hon. Friend quoted Lewis Carroll, and I shall quote Edmund Burke, who said:

"It is a general popular error to imagine the loudest complainers for the public to be the most anxious for its welfare."

It is interesting to note that members of the Labour party dress up their taxation policy in terms of social justice and fairness. High-tax high-spending policies have had precisely the opposite effect. Most people would agree that high-tax, high-spending policies reduce incentives, enterprise and growth, and therefore reduce the chance of jobs in many constituencies. They prevent growth, and therefore the additional finance that the Government have made available for public services. Most important of all, those policies damage the interests of the people in the lower-paid groups whom the Labour party purports to represent.

Not only did the previous Labour Government increase tax rates to 83 per cent.—and 98 per cent. for investment income—for the wealthiest in society, but, because they did not uprate tax allowances in line with the inflation that they had created, 1·8 million more lower-paid people were paying tax when they left office than when they came into office. If we compare that with the Conservative Government's record, we find that 1·2 million lower-paid people are now not paying tax who were paying it under the previous Labour Government.

When we examine the Labour party's proposed tax policies, we must bear two things in mind. First, in the three years between 1974 and 1977, the Labour Government increased the amount of tax payable by an average household with an average income from £389 a year to £876 a year. Secondly, if we compare the share of income tax paid by the top 5 per cent. of earners in 1976 —when the Labour Government were in power, with their high-tax and high-spending policies—with 1989, with the Conservative party's low-taxation policies, we find that that top 5 per cent. have increased their proportion of total tax from 25 to 29 per cent. The top 10 per cent. of earners now pay 40 per cent. as opposed to 35 per cent. of the total tax take, whereas the lowest 50 per cent. of wage earners pay only 16 per cent. of the total tax take. That is hardly unfair.

Let us extend that argument to the amount of wealth held by various proportions of the population. In 1971, again under a high-tax regime—just after the Labour government of 1966-70 has left office—the top 1 per cent. of wealth owners, including pensioners, had 21 per cent. of the total wealth. By 1987, the figure had dropped to only 11 per cent. The top 5 per cent. earned 37 per cent. in 1971 and now earn only 24 per cent. The top 10 per cent. earned 49 per cent. in 1971 and now earn 35 per cent.

Because a low-taxation, high-incentive society gives more people more opportunities to climb the ladder and create wealth, it creates a more even distribution of wealth. That is why a high-incentive——

It being Seven o'clock, proceedings on the motion lapsed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 13 (Arrangement of public business).

7 pm

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I wish to raise a point of order, notice of which I gave to the Chair earlier this evening and to the Home Office an hour or more ago. I understand that immigration officers and police officers are at this moment searching for 33 young Chinese people, including a girl who is eight and a half months pregnant, who arrived in the United Kingdom 10 days ago. I understand that they were in possession of visas to enter Canada and, for reasons which are not known, the airline refused to take them to Canada, and they were left in Britain.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. What is the point of order for me?

Mr. Madden: My point of order is that the British Government professed their outrage at the massacre in Tiananmen square last June. These young people fled China because of that massacre and are now being——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. What is the point of order?

Mr. Madden: They are now threatened with deportation from Britain to Panama, which I do not think is well known as a place of haven and stability. My point of order is that I would urge that no action be taken to arrest, detain or deport these young people until we have——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. Member's concern, but, that has nothing to do with my responsibilities to the House and the Chair.

Mr. Madden: Indeed, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like a statement from the Home Secretary to the House later tonight——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It has taken the hon. Member a long time to get to that matter. I have not received a request for a statement to be made. No doubt the hon. Member's comments will have been heard by those on the Treasury Bench.

Mr. Madden: When I contacted the Home Office earlier tonight, I asked for a Home Office Minister to be present when I raised my point of order at 7 o'clock. I was assured that efforts would be made to have such a Minister present——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must recognise that these are not matters for me. I have no responsibility for them.

Clyde Port Authority Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

7.2 pm

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance on a serious matter concerning the Bill. In respect of my constituency, clause 4(3) and (4) of the Bill are, at best, incompetent and, as worst, ultra vires.

The Clyde port authority, despite its claims, does not own any property on the Greenock waterfront. On 6 July 1772, in Edinburgh, Sir John Shaw Stewart gave the people of Greenock by way of a feu contract the whole of the waterfront between the Kirk burn, Westburn street and the Royal close, Bogle street. The port and harbours were given in trust in perpetuity to the magistrates, treasurer, town council of Greenock and their successors. That generous decision was incorporated in section 26 of the Greenock Port and Harbours Act 1867 and further codified in section 212 of the Greenock Port and Harbours Consolidated Act 1913, which states:

"Nothing herein contained shall hurt or prejudice the charter granted to the town of Greenock in the year one thousand seven hundred and fifty-one by the deceased Sir John Shaw of Greenock Baronet nor the feu contract betwixt John Shaw Stewart Esquire and the magistrates and council of Greenock dated in the year one thousand seven hundred and seventy-two or any rights privileges or dues thereby conferred or thence arising so far as consistent with the provisions of this Act."

Given the CPA's commercial banditry in this matter, I urgently request that the Bill be refused a Second Reading, for the reasons that I have outlined.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am grateful to the hon. Member for having given me notice of his intention to raise these matters. I have had them looked into carefully, and there is nothing out of order about the Bill being down for Second Reading. Any aspects of the Bill that call into question its competence or details in the clause are matters for the Committee to discuss and decide in its examination of the Bill, should it be given a Second Reading by the House. Of course, there is nothing to stop the hon. Member, should he be fortunate in catching my eye, to refer to these matters again during the debate.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. There is a growing custom, which is very unsatisfactory in terms of parliamentary procedure, whereby Ministers make important statements by references in written answers.

The hon. Member for Luton, South (Mr. Bright) received a reply from the Ministry of Defence referring to a report in the Library about the case of Colin Wallace and misinformation. If Governments put substantial, far-reaching statements in the Library, they should offer to give the information, if not in answer to a private notice question arranged through the usual channels, at least by a parliamentary statement. May I ask whether you have had any request Mr. Deputy Speaker, from any Defence Ministers to make an oral report to Parliament on an extremely significant report about Government misdeeds?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am not aware of any request from any Minister to make a statement to the House on this or any other matter.

On the hon. Member's general point, Mr. Speaker has found it necessary in the past to make some critical comments, and no doubt he will read the hon. Member's points with interest.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. My point concerns the way in which the procedures of the House are used. The Bill is clearly a Government measure. The device of private Bill time has been used to consider a Government measure. If this were a Government measure, we would have been able to get much better information and much better explanations about the Bill's purpose than is possible with a private Bill. I wonder whether it is causing you some torment to have the procedures of the House and your stewardship of private Bills abused by the Government.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it on the same point?

Mr. Haynes: I said, further to that point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Frank Haynes, then.

Mr. Haynes: Okay, now we are right.

I watched your face, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when the point of order was made about the Bill: If you had been on the Back Benches, as you were in the past, you would have been playing hell.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Withdraw.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) is not in the Chair; you are. I am saying that, had you been on the Back Benches, you would have been making some representations somewhere. A representation has been made, no progress has been made, so the matter has rightly and properly been raised here. Now you find yourself in the Chair, so I suggest that you have some responsibility, bearing in mind what you would have done on the Back Benches, as you did many years ago.

Mr. Holt: That is out of order.

Mr. Haynes: You twit.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr Haynes) must not use such language when I am on my feet—or even when I am sitting down. The hon. Member cannot remember when I was a Back Bencher —I can hardly remember it. I hope, given what recollection I have, that no right hon. or hon. Member would take my behaviour as a Back Bencher as a role model for him to follow.

The hon. Member will know, as does the House, that private Bills are carefully examined by the examiners before they are put before the House. The examiners must be satisfied that the Bills are correct in all respects for presentation in the House. That has been done in this case, as in every other.

A similar point was raised fairly recently when we had before us a similar Bill—the Tees and Hartlepool Port Authority Bill—and it was dealt with by the occupant of the Chair. I doubt whether I can add anything useful to what was said on that occasion.

Dr. Godman: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Let me ask you a technical question. Given that no petitions of objection have been laid against the Bill, am I right in supposing, that if it is successful, it will go from this place to the Committee on Unopposed Bills? Am I also right in thinking that that Committee cannot consider amendments to the Bill?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is right that, in the absence of petitions, the Bill will go to the Committee on Unopposed Bills, but I think that in that Committee, appropriate amendments that satisfy the rules of order can be tabled, discussed and made. These matters may fall within the scope of what the Chairman of the Committee will permit, and the Committee could, if necessary, refer to the points that the hon. Gentleman has made this evening.

Mr. Haynes: Further to the point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I listened to what you said a little earlier. You did not really listen to what my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) said.

Mr. Holt: Oh!

Mr. Haynes: I wish you would do something about him, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The Bill should be Government business. That is what we are saying. You know that yourself, Sir, without our having to tell you. Government business follows our consideration of this private Bill. That is how the Government are keeping the payroll vote here. That is what is going on.

Can I pick you up on a point that you made earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker? I remember you coming to this place. I followed your election in Doncaster and I know exactly who you kicked out. You can laugh, but I remember it well and I shall not forget it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I do not think that I can usefully add to what I have already said.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Clyde has played a key role in the economic and social history of Scotland and the United Kingdom. It is celebrated in legend and song—although it may be doubted whether Sir Harry Lauder, when he sang:

> "Roamin' in the gloamin'
> By the bonnie banks o' Clyde
> Roamin' in the gloamin'
> Wi' my lassie by my side", had in mind those parts of the bonnie banks owned by the Clyde port authority.

The Bill is about the future, and it will allow the authority to play a full and constructive role in that future. Before I discuss the merits of the case, I shall explain the background——

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Before the hon. Gentleman turns to the merits of the case, I have a question to ask him. He may be interested to know that I travelled through Eastwood this morning, and I looked carefully to see where his constituency touched the Clyde. I could not find any part of Eastwood that touched the Clyde. Now or at some point, will the hon. Gentleman explain to the House his interest in the Bill—indeed, all his interest in the Bill? The House will be interested to know what they are, as the hon. Gentleman certainly cannot be said to have a constituency interest.

[Mr. George Foulkes]

Mr. Stewart: As I understand it, the Clyde port authority area does not touch the hon. Gentleman's constituency either.

Mr. Foulkes: Oh, yes it does.

Mr. Stewart: In any case, I assure the hon. Gentleman that a substantial number of my constituents work for the Clyde port authority.

I was about to start by explaining the general background to the Bill. As the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman) pointed out in his learned point of order, no petitions have been lodged against the Bill. The existence of the Bill has been well known for some time and no riparian authority has petitioned against it. The Bill has been fully considered by the local authorities concerned.

Mr. Holt: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as the local authorities petitioned against the Tees and Hartlepool Port Authority Bill, and the fact that the Labour-controlled authorities in Scotland have not petitioned against the present Bill means that they support it?

Mr. Stewart: I hesitate to go quite as far as my hon. Friend, but no authority has petitioned against the Bill —nor has any other body.

Dr. Godman: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman, especially given the compliments that he has just paid me. Can he confirm, on the basis of his wide procedural knowledge, that although no petitions of objection have been laid in this place, there will be an opportunity for petitions of objection to be laid in another place within the 10 days after the Bill receives its Third Reading?

Mr. Stewart: I hesitate to give procedural guidance to the hon. Gentleman, as I can claim no expertise in the matter. My own—perhaps erroneous—understanding is that the hon. Gentleman is perfectly correct.

I emphasise the fact that the decision to pursue the private Bill route was made unanimously by the board of the Clyde port authority. That distinguished board includes a Labour politician who is extremely well known in the west of Scotland—the chairman of Strathclyde regional council's economic and industrial development committee, Mr. McGarry—and Mr. Tom O'Connor of the Transport and General Workers Union. Moreover, the Transport and General Workers Union has adopted different positions in respect of the Scottish and the English ports. The union has decided to take no action on moves by the Scottish ports towards public limited company status.

The Clyde Port Authority Order 1965 prevents the authority from competing on equal terms with continental ports or with ports in the United Kingdom. The general shift in traffic from west to east coast in recent years has made it necessary for ports on the west coast of Britain to consider means of diversification to reduce the vulnerability of the existing port businesses. The existing powers of the authority, contained in the 1965 order, are restrictive and may be changed only by legislation. The authority has long been mindful of the restrictions imposed on its powers and has sought to operate within those limits.

Mr. Worthington: Can the hon. Gentleman give examples from recent years to show how the powers have been restrictive? When has the authority wanted to do things that it has not been permitted to do?

Mr. Stewart: I was just about to expand on that point, and I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be reassured when I reach the end of my explanation.

The view taken by the board of the authority—I suggest correctly—has meant that the authority has not been able to take up investment opportunities that have come its way, given that its powers to invest are limited by paragraph 64 of the 1965 order to port-related businesses. Similarly, the authority is prohibited from acquiring property other than for port purposes and from developing its property, except with a view to its ultimate disposal. As Opposition Members know, the authority is a substantial riparian landowner. As such, and consistent with its role as the port of Clyde authority it is naturally anxious to participate fully and assist in the regeneration of the river and the river bank. Its limited powers of investment and property development mean that it has considerable difficulty entering into joint venture agreements or investing in joint venture companies to handle development of riverside sites.

Mr. Worthington: I want to modify my earlier question. How would this Bill alter the authority's ability to develop the land that the authority owns at present?

Mr. Stewart: I was about to reach that point.

The need for ultimate disposal means that the authority has no effective means of securing control, or even influence, over any development. An inability to purchase land other than for——

Mr. Worthington: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: No. I have already given way to the hon. Gentleman several times.

Mr. Worthington: The hon. Gentleman has not answered my question.

Mr. Stewart: If the hon. Gentleman will give me a minute, I will endeavour to answer his question.

An inability to purchase land other than for purposes directly related to the port business, makes site assembly and efficient use of the authority's existing land resources in relation to the regeneration of the river well-nigh impossible.

Mr. Worthington: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: I have already given way several times to the hon. Gentleman. However, I will give way to him once more because I am aware of his interest in these matters.

Mr. Worthington: I am extremely grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

With regard to whether the Clyde port authority must eventually dispose of land, I should be grateful if the hon. Gentleman could draw my attention to the part of the legislation which sets that out. I know that the port authority can enter into, and I believe has entered into, substantial leasing arrangements with private companies; they do not involve the disposal of land. I am at a loss to understand from what part of the legislation the hon. Gentleman has derived his information.

Mr. Stewart: I have referred to the advice provided to the authority by its lawyers. The legal advice is that, because of the existing provisions, the authority is inhibited in the ways that I have described.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) has raised an important point. As I understand it, the case being made by the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) rests on the proposition that the powers of the Clyde port authority, in its present form, are so severely restricted that it is necessary for it to be metamorphosed into something else. The hon. Member for Eastwood is presenting the Bill and my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie asked him very reasonably what the authority cannot do now that it could do if the Bill was approved. The hon. Member for Eastwood could tell us only that the lawyers have advised the authority. The authority presumably advised the hon. Gentleman and the hon. Gentleman is now advising the House. Fourth-hand rumour rather than statement of fact in this House is unacceptable.

Mr. Stewart: If that is the case, it is extremely surprising that the Clyde port authority board which included Mr. Lawrence McGarry felt it necessary to introduce this Bill. It has been the board's view for a considerable time that its advice is that the present powers are restrictive and are particularly restrictive in relation to its desire to enter into joint ventures and take a full part in the urban regeneration of the Clyde.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I am sure that I am not the only person who is becoming perturbed at what the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) is saying. Even if the lawyers are mistaken and the restrictions are not as they have been described to the hon. Member for Eastwood, the House will waste a great deal of time unnecessarily. Surely it is not good enough to discover whether the lawyers' advice was correct in the Committee. The House is entitled to know now what specific parts of the legislation are——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is not a matter for me. I made it clear in response to earlier points of order that the Bill has been scrutinised by the examiners, who are satisfied about its format.

Mr. Foulkes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Let me deal with one point of order at a time. The other point raised by the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) is a matter for debate and an issue that may be taken into account by the House when it reaches its decision at the conclusion of this debate.

Mr. Foulkes: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) relates to a point of order raised earlier by my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington). A private Member is introducing this Bill. If the Bill had been introduced by a Government Department, the Minister would be properly briefed and able to give legal opinion. He could then explain the matter to the House. We do not have the answer to that problem because the Bill is being introduced by a private Member who has been inadequately briefed and who cannot deal with the particular problem. Does that not show that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, should have at least considered the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I assure the hon. Gentleman that I did consider the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) and I hope that I responded to it fully. I cannot usefully add to what I said then. The Bill is in order. Some of the reservations that have been expressed under the cover of points of order are matters that could be made in debate and taken into account when the House reaches a conclusion. The Minister is in his place and will doubtless try to catch my eye during the debate. It is not for me to anticipate what he might say, but no doubt he is listening and may feel able to respond as appropriate. In the meantime, we should allow the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) to make his speech.

Mr. Stewart: It may be helpful if I refer hon. Members to the statement on behalf of the promoters of the Bill in support of this Second Reading, copies of which are available in the Vote Office. In particular, I refer hon. Members to paragraph 6, which will be helpful.

Mr. Wilson: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Member for Eastwood to refer to a paragraph which bears no relevance to the points that he was making? Paragraph 6 states:

"The Port Authority would wish their business to have a commercial freedom beyond the severely restricted scope of the present powers of the Port Authority. The aim of the Bill is therefore to free the conduct of the Port Authority's business from the restrictions arising from their present limited powers. The mechanism which the Bill provides to achieve this is the establishing of a two tier company structure;—that is—(a) a successor company; and (b) a holding company."

With respect, Mr. Deputy Speaker——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Those are not matters for me. Whether the hon. Gentleman is correctly reading or misreading a document that is not an integral part of the Bill is a matter for the House to take into account in reaching a conclusion at the end of the debate. It is not a matter for me to rule on.

Mr. Stewart: The Clyde Port Authority Bill retains the existing powers, duties and responsibilities of the authority regarding the maintenance and improvement of the port undertaking. The core port business——

Mr. Worthington: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Stewart: No. I have already given way about six times to the hon. Gentleman.

The core port business will be operated by the successor company, a wholly owned subsidiary of the new holding company to be created by the Bill. To sum up——

Mr. Worthington: What?

Mr. Stewart: I have not finished. I hope that the hon. Gentleman can contain himself.

[Mr. Stewart]

The holding company will have wider commercial powers than the authority has at present. The holding company will be a normal public limited company and it will be able to use its resources flexibly as it wishes. The successor company will inherit and preserve the statutory duties of the authority.

Mr. Worthington: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that very important point?

Mr. Stewart: No, I have already given way about six times to the hon. Gentleman.

I want to refer briefly to the potential effects on employment of the structural changes. It would be fair to say that the restructuring programme will increase job security for the present employees and in due course will lead to increased employment throughout the west of Scotland. The existing employees do not oppose the proposals.

It is expected that four separate elements will be involved in the capital structure of the new body. The authority will put forward an employee share ownership plan—an ESOP. Current employees will be invited to subscribe for shares, for which interest-free loans may be made available.

Mr. Jimmy Wray (Glasgow, Provan): Will the hon. Gentleman give way to clarify a point?

Mr. Stewart: Yes, because the hon. Gentleman has not previously sought to intervene.

Mr. Wray: Who will be responsible for dredging? Will the successor company be responsible for dredging the river?

Mr. Stewart: That is a fair question, and the answer is yes. The successor company will be responsible for dredging the river. It will operate under precisely the same duties and responsibilities as does the Clyde port authority at present.

Mr. Worthington: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. From a lack of knowledge, the hon. Member who is introducing the Bill may be misleading the House. As I understand the previous legislation, the Clyde Port Authority Order 1965, the Clyde port authority has been given powers to dredge the river; the duty is not there. The hon. Gentleman is saying that the successor company will dredge the river, but I believe that he is giving an undertaking that cannot be given because there have been occasions when the Clyde port authority has sought to withdraw from dredging.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: These are not matters for the Chair: they are matters for debate.

Mr. Stewart: In answer to the question from the hon. Member for Glasgow, Provan (Mr. Wray), I was making the point that the successor company would be under precisely the same duties and obligations as those applying to the Clyde port authority at the moment.

I was talking about the capital structure of the new body. In addition to current employees, past employees, pensioners and their spouses and children will also be invited to subscribe to shares. The authority will also allow subscription by institutional investors, with preference given to institutional support in the west of Scotland.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on his point about employee share ownership?

Mr. Stewart: I shall give way, but for the last time, because I may be straining the patience of the House.

Mr. Foulkes: I hope that this is a helpful question, so the hon. Gentleman may be grateful to me. The hon. Gentleman said that there would be an employee share ownership plan—an ESOP. What percentage of the total shares will be available for that employee share ownership plan? How is it intended that the shares will be distributed between employees? Will it be on an equal or hierarchical basis, based on salary or other considerations?

Mr. Stewart: As I understand it, the intention is to have the proportion of employee shares as high as possible, as far as is reasonable. I cannot give the hon. Gentleman a specific percentage in response to his question, but I repeat that the availability will be as high as possible. It is hoped that shares will be made available to residents in the Clyde port region, and that is actively being considered.

I have not spoken about the general problems of trust ports. They are familiar to the House, which has debated them previously. I emphasise that these proposals are the result of the unanimous view of the board of the Clyde port authority and that there is no significant body of opinion against the Bill among the local authorities in the west of Scotland. No local authority has stated its opposition to the Bill. The Scottish Development Agency, Strathclyde regional council and the unions have all been consulted. Against that background of the absence of opposition from such organisations in the west of Scotland, and in view of the clear merits of the provisions, I hope that the House will give the Bill its Second Reading.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): I wish first to assess the Bill's implications for my constituents and constituency and then to outline my reservations on a couple of broader issues.

As the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) has said, the Bill has implications for the whole of the Clyde, both for the river and for the firth. In the past few days, I have discussed the Bill with Inverclyde district councillors, with employees at the Tate and Lyle cane sugar refinery and with those employed at the Greenock container terminal—all of whom may well be affected if the Bill becomes law. In addition, I have met John Mearns, the secretary of the Greenock Waterfront Heritage Society, and Derek Ferguson and other members of that society on several occasions. They too have expressed their serious concern about the Bill.

Incidentally, and in respect of a question that I asked the hon. Member for Eastwood earlier, perhaps he or his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) will correct me if I am wrong, but I believe that I am right in saying that, although petitions of objections cannot now be lodged against the Bill in this House, such petitions can be lodged in another place withing 10 days of the date on which the Bill receives its Third Reading. I believe that that is the case, but I should welcome guidance on that matter because I must advise the hon. Member for Eastwood that certain interested parties intend to table such petitions if the Bill goes to another place.

My reservations about the ownership claims of the Clyde port authority to, say, James Watt dock in Greenock and to the Greenock container terminal are shared by many of my constituents.

Mr. Foulkes: Is my hon. Friend aware that, at 1 o'clock this afternoon, the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland vessel, the Clupa, set sail from the James Watt dock to examine the explosives that had been dumped in the Clyde by ICI? Does my hon. Friend join me in welcoming that move but hope that it will result in some of his and my fishermen constituents receiving adequate and proper compensation for their loss?

Dr. Godman: In that interesting intervention, my hon. Friend has emphasised the importance of the facilities. He is absolutely right. All credit to the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland for initiating that exercise. The James Watt dock and other facilities are used by vessels of the fisheries protection service. I agree with my hon. Friend that the dumping of explosive materials causes great concern to me, my constituents and many members of the Clyde Fishermen's Association.

If my challenge to the legality of the CPA's ownership of the waterfront facilities in Greenock is dismissed by the scrutiny of the Committee on Unopposed Bills—if the Bill gets that far—I believe that the Clyde port authority should offer the Inverclyde district council, which is in a real sense the successor body to the Greenock town council, a sum of, say, £2 million by way of compensation for its commercial banditry in my constituency.

When I raised a point of order about the competence of the Bill, I mentioned some contracts that had been signed in Edinburgh in July 1772. I obtained a copy of the document from the Public Records Office in Edinburgh a few days ago. Among other things, it states:

"It shall not be lawful nor in the power of the said magistrates, treasurer, town council of Greenock nor their successors in office, to sell,"— this may well interest the hon. and learned Member for Perth, and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn)—

"alienate, dispose either irredeemably or under reversion nor wadsett, or burden with infefments of annualment or any other servitudes or burden the said harbour with anchorages, shore, bay, or ring dues, whereby the same may be evicted or adjudged and that all such dispositions, conveyances, wadsetts or other deeds so to be granted by them or their foresaids conveying or burdening the said subjects with any real diligence following thereon shall ipso jure be void null and shall only be effectual against the granter."

Mr. Foulkes: That had to be said.

Dr. Godman: One can see that I have done a little bit of research.

As I said earlier, that feu contract was incorporated in the Greenock Port and Harbours Act 1867 and was further codified in Section 212 of the Greenock Port and Harbours Consolidation Act 1913. It is my view, and as hon. Members well know I am not a lawyer——

Mr. Foulkes: A barrack room lawyer.

Dr. Godman: I may be a barrack room lawyer, as my hon. Friend says.

I should like to hear the Minister's opinion of the validity of section 212 of the 1913 Act. The Act questions the competence of the Bill.

The feu contract has been watched over by members of the Stewart family over the years. In May 1865, an attempt to abrogate the feu contract of 1772 was successfully repelled by Miss Jane Stewart of Liberton Manse, near Edinburgh, in a court action. In 1965, the picture changed. The Greenock harbour trust was succeeded by the Clyde port authority. Therefore, Sir John Shaw Stewart's remarkably generous gift to the people of Greenock was eagerly, some would say greedily, swallowed by the Clyde ports authority.

Since that inauspicious day, the Clyde port authority has sold to the Scottish Development Agency the whole of the custom house quay with its fine custom house, which I am pleased to say was recently renovated——

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): At what price?

Dr. Godman: I am glad that the hon. and learned Gentleman is awake. It was sold, together with all the buildings and land to the west, towards the container terminal. Therefore, eight hectares of land and some fine buildings were sold by the CPA, in an act of banditry, to the Scottish Development Agency for £1·75 million.

The Scottish Development Agency is just as cavalier as the CPA in its attitude towards traditional maritime users of the harbour facilities on the Greenock water front. A couple of years ago I had to speak to the chairman of the SDA about the high-handed behaviour of his officials towards fishermen who were mooring their boats in East India harbour, Greenock. In a letter dated 5 December 1988, I said to Sir Robin Duthie that the Fish Act 1705, colloquially known as Queen Anne's Act, still gave certain rights to fishermen.

I shall quote from that Act, because it is directly relevant to today's proceedings:

"the Estates of Parliament authorises and impowers all . . . subjects to take buy and cure herring and white fish in all sundry and sea channels bays firths lochs rivers etc. . . . wheresoever herring or white fish are or may be taken. And for their greater conveniency to have the free use of all ports harbours shoars forelands and others for bringing in pickeling drying unloading and loading the same upon payment of the ordinary dues where harbours are built. That is, such as are payed for Ships, Boats and other Goods."

I look forward to the hon. Member for Eastwood assuring me, on behalf of the CPA, that, if the Bill were to be successful, the new company would behave more responsibly with regard to the Queen Anne Act than did the SDA. That Act was passed by the Scottish Parliament in Edinburgh in September 1705.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: We have been entertained with a lot of nonsense during the past 20 minutes. The hon. Gentleman's constituency probably contains more wonderful buildings than any of ours are privileged to have. The local authority has been appallingly neglectful. The great customs house has been restored with money given by the Historic Buildings Council for Scotland—alas, to be a value added tax office. The great building beside it is falling down, and the ropeworks is no nearer salvation. I find it strange that anyone should claim in aid the concept of heritage as a reason why the Bill should not be passed, when it would give the new authority powers to redeem and restore that great part of the Clyde.

Dr. Godman: We have just been entertained by a characteristic mixture of buffoonery and exuberant malice. I have sought the assistance of the hon. and learned Gentleman to conserve some of those buildings. I regret that he did not show his usual courtesy in acknowledging my request for his expert help in the conservation of those buildings.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: The hon. Gentleman must give way. I replied immediately, and the case is before us. It is his local authority which is stalling, and he should withdraw that malicious remark.

Dr. Godman: I have no intention of withdrawing that malicious remark, because it was not at all malicious. I am not responsible for decisions taken by the Inverclyde district council. I am the Member of Parliament for Greenock and Port Glasgow, not a district councillor.

While the Bill cannot be amended in this place unless it is amended when it is scrutinised by the Committee on Unopposed Bills, I hope that amendments will be introduced when, as appears likely, it goes before an Opposed Bill Committee in another place. I hope that, if the Bill becomes law, no harm will come to the Greenock container terminal. I seek an assurance from the hon. Member for Eastwood on that.

On Friday, I spoke to Mr. Phil Cannie and some of his colleagues who load and unload cargo at the terminal. They also expressed their legitimate concern that the terminal should continue to function as a terminal. Business is undoubtedly picking up at the terminal, which has an important role to play in the local economy. It would be a great shame if the Clyde port authority were to dispose of it. It has an important role to play as a terminal, not as a site for executive-style housing. Trade is picking up, as I am sure the CPA will confirm. Timber cargoes are coming in, and the CPA has talked about investing in facilities for the transportation of wood pulp. It is absolutely essential that the hon. Gentleman gives an assurance tonight.

The same holds good for the James Watt dock, where, among other things, raw cane sugar is unloaded for refining at the Tate and Lyle sugar refinery. There are just two cane sugar refineries left in the United Kingdom. There used to be many more in Greenock, Liverpool and London. One of the remaining two, the Westland refinery, is in my constituency, and the other is in the constituency that is ably and honourably represented by my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing).

The refinery in Greenock employs about 300 people, most of whom are my constituents. The hon. Member for Eastwood spoke about security of employment in the Clyde port authority. I welcome that, but we also have to think about security of employment for those who are employed in the ancillary industries that are served by the Clyde port authority's maintenance of dock side and other port facilities. The 300 people who work in the refinery have an interest in the Bill.

I remind the hon. Member for Eastwood, Mr. John Mather and Mr. Bob Easton of the Clyde port authority that the House has twice passed without Division two resolutions, both of which acknowledged the need to protect the interests of the east African, Caribbean and Pacific cane sugar producers and those British citizens who are employed in our port and in the sugar refining industry. The second of the resolutions was passed on 2 December 1985 and is reported in columns 107 to 127 of the Official Report. I hope that the House will forgive my lack of modesty when I say that I was able to persuade the then Minister of State, Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to accept my amendment to his resolution. He accepted it with his usual grace.

The first resolution was passed under a Labour Administration and the second under a Tory Administration, and both stressed the need to protect our cane sugar refineries. Last week I spoke to Mr. Stevie Kane and other shop stewards in Tate and Lyle, who also expressed their serious concern about the Bill and its implications for their refinery. I hope that assurances and guarantees about the continuation of sugar cargoes into Greenock can be given by the hon. Member for Eastwood. Nothing less will do for my constituents who are employed by Tate and Lyle.

These are important matters, because unemployment in my constituency is still scandalously high—much higher than the level in the Strathclyde region and at least two and a half times as high as the United Kingdom level. The people that I have mentioned have a legitimate interest in the Bill, even though they do not work for the Clyde port authority.

I should now like to deal with the dredging of the Clyde. I know that the Minister for Aviation and Shipping will respond to this. Despite my considerable respect for Bob Easton, the chairman of the Clyde port authority, and for John Mather, the chief executive of the authority, I cannot believe that a private company would continue to dredge that channel on any basis other than a commercial contract. The dredging of the Clyde is an essential operation because, if it were not carried out for two years, the channel would silt up and no vessel would be able to enter the docks at Glasgow, except for the King George V dock. Mr. John Mather and Mr. Bob Easton would not deny that.

Some of my constituents work for Kvaerner of Govan and others work for Yarrow's. Both those shipyards employ several thousand men and women whose livelihood utterly depends on the efficient dredging of that channel. I am not entirely certain of my figures, but I think that I am right in saying that the Clyde port authority pays more than £600,000 towards the total cost, Yarrow's pays at least £100,000 per annum, Glasgow district council pays a similar sum and Strathclyde regional council pays an amount not dissimilar to that.

Kvaerner also pays for the dredging of that navigable channel. When Kvaerner negotiated the acquisition of the yard from British Shipbuilders, it swithered over the deal because of the responsibility that it would have for the cost of the dredging operation.

I seek an assurance from the Minister for Aviation and Shipping and from the hon. Member for Eastwood that that essential work will continue. If it does not, the shipyards at Port Glasgow will be irrevocably ruined within two years by the amount of silt that is carried up the Clyde on each tide. As I have said, I do not think that a private company would carry out dredging other than on the basis of a commercial contract, and I would not blame its shareholders for that.

Mrs. Fyfe: Would my hon. Friend comment on the possibility that dredging might continue but at an unreasonable cost? What are the implications of that?

Dr. Godman: That is a worry for my hon. Friend and for other hon. Members who represent Glasgow constituencies. My hon. Friend must have constituents who work in Kvaerner in Govan and in Yarrows. I listened diligently to the speech by the hon. Member for Eastwood, but I did not hear the kind of guarantee that I am seeking about dredging. Perhaps he knows the Clyde better than I do, and my constituency is not directly affected. If the Clyde silts up, the shipyards may move down to Greenock. That would not break my heart, although my hon. Friends might throw me into the Clyde for even daring to suggest such a move.

Dredging is an essential commitment that must be honoured by those who manage the ports, whether that is the Clyde port authority or its successor body. Perhaps the Minister would tell us who will pay for that essential operation. Will it be the local council, the shipyards or the Scottish Office? I am glad that the Under-Secretary of State for Scotland, the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton) is in the Chamber and listening with his characteristic courtesy and attentiveness. He may be able to tell the Minister for Aviation and Shipping that the Scottish Office will pick up the Bill. I would welcome that. Ministers may laugh, but this is no laughing matter on the Clyde.

I fear that, in time, the new company may be considered fair game by a distant predator in far-off London, Paris, Tokyo or somewhere else. I respect Messrs. Easton and Mather, and I know that both are committed to the Clyde and its well-being. However, they may well be thrown overboard by a London or New York-based predator—although, I hope, not literally.

I hope that the Bill will be chucked overboard. If it avoids that fate because of the skill of Ministers and the Whips Office, I certainly hope that it will be amended in another place in ways that are satisfactory to my constituents, given their legitimate interest in the Bill and their concern for the development of the Greenock waterfront from its container terminal down to James Watt dock and beyond. I do not believe that the Clyde port authority owns those properties, but if I am proved wrong because of past legislation, I believe that that authority should act generously and give a fair amount of compensation to the Inverclyde district council. As it stands, the Bill offers little comfort to the maritime communities on the River Clyde and the firth of Clyde.

The Minister for Aviation and Shipping (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): It may be for the convenience of the House if, at this stage, I make a brief statement of the Government's views on the Bill. On 15 March, the House gave a Second Reading to the Tees and Hartlepool Port Authority Bill. The Clyde Port Authority Bill is an almost identical measure, and the Government's position on both Bills is the same.

Trust ports are slightly odd bodies. They are independent and not accountable to anyone. Their powers and sources of finance are limited, but they must compete with ports run by companies, such as Associated British Ports and Felixstowe, which have the flexibility and accountability that the trust ports lack. It has long been in the Government's mind that it would be desirable if at least the main commercial trust ports could be converted into companies. Changing the status of a trust port in that way needs primary legislation.

The Government have not been able to find room in their programme for appropriate legislation. It was for that reason that, about a year ago, my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon), when he was the Secretary of State for Transport, encouraged trust ports, which saw benefits in turning themselves into companies, to bring forward their own private Bills. It is still our intention to bring forward Government legislation on trust ports at the earliest convenient opportunity, but given the pressure on our legislative programme, private legislation is the only way in which any of those ports can quickly be converted into fully fledged private sector enterprises.

The present Bill will not alter the statutory responsibilities and powers that the Clyde port authority has under its existing private legislation.

Mr. Worthington: That is an extremely important assurance and we need to know what it means. I am particularly interested in the issue raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman)—the responsibility for dredging. As the Government back the Bill, does that mean that they are making a clear-cut commitment that dredging will continue at its present rate for ever? As I understand it, however, it is quite possible for the successor company to give up dredging when it wants to.

Mr. McLoughlin: I cannot add to what I have just said. The statutory responsibilities and powers of the Clyde port authority, as set out in existing private legislation, will remain the same. Obviously the matter raised by the hon. Gentleman is one to be discussed in Committee as the Bill makes progress.

The existing legislation will be carried forward lock, stock and barrel to the proposed new successor company. successor company will still be a harbour authority. It will be subject also, just as the port authority is today, to those provisions of public legislation that apply to harbour authorities generally. I emphasise that there will be no loss or reduction in existing powers or obligations. That is a very important point, and the House should not be under any misunderstanding. The position is exactly the same as when Associated British Ports was privatised on the Government's initiative.

Mrs. Fyfe: Although the dredging may continue, can the Minister give us any assurances about the cost and who will pay?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am sure that if I started to give such answers, one might easily conclude that this was not a private Bill. I am merely stating the Government's position in relation to the private Bill. Other inquiries must be made through the proper channels when the Bill is in Committee.

The Government support the principle underlying the Bill. It is, however, necessary for Parliament to give careful consideration to the public interest in the conversion of trust port authorities into companies.

We agree with the promoters of the Bill that trust ports have no explicit owners, so it is for Parliament to decide, taking into account any views expressed by the Government, not only whether a trust port should be allowed to turn itself into a company, but who should get the proceeds from the sale of the shares of that company. The Government's view is that a proportion of the proceeds of sale should go to the Exchequer. We are considering the best way of securing that, but the intention, which Parliament would be asked to approve, would be that 50 per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of shares should be paid to the Secretary of State and paid into the Consolidated Fund whenever a trust port is converted into a company by means of private Act.

The Government regard that as an equitable share of the proceeds between the Exchequer and the new shareholders. In making that decision, we took into account the initiative shown by the Tees and Hartlepool and the Clyde port authorities in introducing their private Bills, the benefits of early privatisation, and the ports' intention to invest in new developments.

Mr. Wilson: What are the Government getting the money for?

Mr. McLoughlin: In the past, we have given certain grants, so it is required that there should be a return to the taxpayer, through the Exchequer, for some of those grants. The percentage was agreed as a broad figure for all trust ports that may introduce private Bills in the future.

We must bear in mind the interests of the taxpayer, who has contributed to the development of the trust ports, and the need to ensure a level playing field between the newly privatised trust ports and those ports already in the private sector. Therefore, on that basis, the present Bill has my full support.

8.6 pm

Mr. David Lambie (Cunninghame, South): I was glad to hear the Minister's assurance that the Government will bring in legislation on the trust ports, but that makes me even more suspicious of the Bill.

According to the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), if the Bill is passed it will have little influence on the present activities of the Clyde port authority. If that is so and given the Government's intention to introduce legislation, why has this Bill been brought in now? Why not wait until the Government bring in the legislation that will deal with all trust ports? We could then have a full debate on the Floor of the House and in Standing Committee and deal with all the issues that have been raised, either in points of order or in the specific questions put by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman).

In common with my hon. Friend the Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes), I am curious about the interest that the hon. Member for Eastwood has in the Clyde port authority. He told us that he was interested because certain of his constituents worked in that authority. That is a legitimate interest for any Member of Parliament, but surely it is not strong enough to sponsor a private Bill. Why was not my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow asked to bring in the Bill? Why were not the hon. Members representing Glasgow or Cunninghame asked to bring in the Bill?

After the next election, when the hon. Member for Eastwood loses his seat, as most of the Scottish Tory Members will, I ask him to guarantee that he will not accept a directorship on the board of the new company. I should like the hon. Gentleman to answer that question and to give us an assurance that his future financial interests do not make him enthusiastic about the Bill being given a Second Reading tonight.

I am serious about the matter and hope that the hon. Gentleman will answer that question. Some of his hon. Friends took part in previous debates on privatisation. I do not want to name names, my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) can do that, as he is harder than I am. If he is willing to mention the name of the new director of the bus company, Stagecoach, I am sure that he will mention other names if he manages to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. What is the interest of the hon. Member for Eastwood in the Bill?

I was suspicious about the Bill when it was drawn to my attention by my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow. When I came down from Scotland because of the one-line Whip, I was sure that, after listening to the hon. Member for Eastwood, I would understand why the Bill is necessary. I did not get that information. He said that the only difference would be that the authority could enter into joint ventures to sell property and land.

The hon. Member for Eastwood put us under tremendous pressure by saying that some of my trade union friends were supporters of the Bill—Tom O'Connor from the Transport and General Workers and Lawrence McGarry, the former chairman of the economic and industrial development committee of Strathclyde regional council, who are members of the board. They should have contacted Strathclyde Labour Members of Parliament before they decided to support the Bill given us their reasons. I am worried that they have the same interest in the Bill as I hope the hon. Member for Eastwood will not have after the next general election, when he is no longer a Member of Parliament.

In the statement on the behalf of the promoters, in support of Second Reading, paragraph 2 states that the port authority

"is profitable; and it does not rely on government subsidies."

You do not know much about the Clyde, Mr. Deputy Speaker so I must explain that this is a Bill about the Clyde port authority——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I was unloading cargo and cargo handling during almost the whole of 1947 and 1948, on King George V dock.

Mr. Lambie: I withdraw my accusation, as I understand that it has no foundation. I can cut short my speech as I was about to give you the background to the Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker, so that you could deal with the important points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington).

The Clyde port authority is a profitable company, but the accounts for a period of years show that it has been profitable not because of its port or harbour activities but because it has sold assets. My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow gave us an example. It sold the heritage of Greenock and Port Glasgow to the Scottish Development Agency. Not that I criticise what the agency has done, but the people of Clydeside would have been happier with industry, harbour and port activities, which we had in the past, and not grass, trees and green fields.

The Clyde port authority has been successful because it has sold its assets, but it has reached the stage where it needs additional help to become more profitable. That is why it needs permission to establish joint ventures. The authority wants to bring in other vultures—not the ones on the roof, but the ones in the private sector—to rip off the heritage of the Clyde, which has been built up by the people of Clydeside for centuries when it was the foremost port in the United Kingdom.

With the development of Europe and the decrease in trade across the Atlantic to the Americas, the Clyde port authority has found itself in difficulty. However, it took the easy road out, and instead of trying to develop port facilities, it balanced the books by selling property and assets. That is my criticism and I have often made it to the authority and on the Floor of the Chamber.

I represent Cunninghame together with my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North and within our constituencies we have two important ports that are integral parts of the Clyde—the deep-water port of Hunterston and the port of Ardrossan.

I am speaking tonight because I am interested in the development of the port of Hunterston, which is unique in the west coast of Scotland and unique in Europe because it is one of the few deep water ports. However, it has not been developed and the blame lies with the board of the Clyde port authority.

Before I entered Parliament I took part in a trade union and labour movement campaign to persuade the Government to designate the Hunterston peninsula as an industrial area for steel, oil-refining and chemical activities. Those industries could have been developed there because large bulk carriers can come into the port and discharge their cargoes cheaply. The Clyde port authority has not developed the unique facilities of Hunterston; it has allowed it to die.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow said, the port is now experiencing a slight upsurge in business, but if there is an adverse decision about the future of Ravenscraig steelworks, the port of Hunterston will be finished because its other activities will not be sufficient to sustain it.

Perhaps I am criticising the Clyde port authority unfairly for not developing Hunterston. I realise that it was placed under servere restraint due to the operation of the dock labour scheme and that a major disaster occurred when the Iron and Steel Trades Confederation, the steelworkers' union, was not allowed to organise workers loading and unloading ships at Hunterston. I realise that after a six-month strike, when Transport and General Workers Union reinforced the position of the dockers, it tied the hands of the Clyde port authority a little. Again, the authority should have fought more than it did.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North and I are also interested in the port of Ardrossan, which has been in decline while it has been under the Clyde port authority's control. When I represented central Ayrshire, which contains the port of Troon, I was interested in Associated British Ports. In Ayr, we were interested in comparing the port of Ayr with activities and development at the port of Ardrossan—there was no comparison. In fact, I often put the case to Ministers for the port of Ardrossan to be taken away from the Clyde port authority and handed over to Associated British Ports, even after it had been privatised.

I hope that the Bill will be thrown out tonight and that the Government will bring forward their proposed legislation for all the trust ports. If it is not thrown out, I hope that we shall secure amendments to it that will break up the Clyde port authority and withdraw from it the ports of Hunterston and Ardrossan. The future of the two ports does not lie with the Clyde Port Authority plc; it lies with an independent company developing both ports for the benefit of the people of Cunninghame, rather than subsidising a defunct Clyde port authority.

Dr. Godman: Can my hon. Friend advise me about the responsibility of the Clyde port authority as a pilotage authority? Would not the Clyde Port Authority plc still have responsibility as a pilotage authority?

Mr. Lambie: I am afraid that I cannot answer that question, but I am sure that the hon. Member for Eastwood or the Minister will answer it.

I appreciate that I may be arguing against some of my hon. Friends who represent the upper Clyde and the River Clyde, but I want the Hunterston and Ardrossan ports to be split from the Clyde river authority. If the Bill is enacted and the Clyde port authority ceases to be a trust port and becomes a plc, it will get all the money and will concentrate all its development on the buying and selling of property and land.

Therefore, the ports of Hunterston and Ardrossan should become independent, even if that means them being taken over by a privatised Associated British Ports. At least they have shown an initiative that has not been shown by the Clyde port authority. If that authority and my friends who are directors on its board want to become property and land developers, let them. Of course, I appreciate that that would cause a problem for some of my hon. Friends.

I hope that we will not be defeated tonight by the votes of Scottish Members. I am a little disappointed that there is not one representative of the Scottish National party present. Perhaps they are at a wake for the resignation of the chairman of their party, Mr. Gordon Wilson, who today announced his intention to resign at the next conference.

Mr. Holt: It was kind of the hon. Gentleman to point out that no Scottish Nationalist Member is present. He forgot to mention that there are no Liberal Democrat Members present either. Of course, about 20 Scottish Labour Members have an interest in the port, but fewer than half of them have been present tonight.

Mr. Lambie: I was about to refer to the absence of Liberal Democrat Members. Strathclyde has had a fair parliamentary representation tonight. Those Scottish Members who are not here are feeding, and they will soon come in in droves.

I ask the hon. Member for Eastwood to declare any interest, or any possible future interest, in the Clyde Port Authority plc. In view of his arguments and the poor content of his speech, I ask him to withdraw the Bill.

8.26 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I speak in this debate because no one from Scotland can doubt the importance of the Clyde to Scotland's well-being. Ever since the industrial revolution, it has contributed substantially to the well-being, the benefit and the massive enhancement in values for those who live in the area and throughout Scotland generally.

[Mr. Bill Walker]

I especially remember the Clyde during the difficult years of the second world war, when troop ships came in from north America and the Clyde was regularly a target for the Luftwaffe. Anyone who saw the Clyde operating as a port in those days could never forget the extremely difficult circumstances with troop ships coming in from north America or going out to the middle and far east.

Dr. Godman: Will the hon. Gentleman confirm that the Clyde port authority came into being in 1965?

Mr. Walker: I do not wish to become involved in pedantic arguments. I hope that the hon. Gentleman appreciates that I am commending the Clyde's contribution to the well-being of the nation.

Dr. Godman: In view of the hon. Gentleman's stout defence of all those employed in the whisky industry, does he agree that it is a great shame that the overwhelming majority of whisky products are exported not from Greenock or Grangemouth, but from English ports? Is not that a matter for deep regret?

Mr. Walker: I make no apology for saying that the whisky industry carries out its business in the most efficient way possible, however that is done. The whisky industry has a future in its present form and it will continue to have one, provided that it exports its products in the most cost-effective and efficient way. It is not my job to second-guess the whisky companies in determining the routes through which they send their products abroad. My concern is to ensure that the £1,000 million-plus of whisky products that are exported continue to be exported. It has never been my desire, in public or in private life, to impose upon private sector companies restrictions that would in any way limit their performance in the world marketplace.

Dr. Godman: I repeat, the hon. Gentleman looks after the interests of those of his constituents working in the whisky industry with remarkable vigour. However, if the major ports on the Clyde and the Forth were to disappear, the subsidies offered to the whisky distillers and blenders to take their products out through English ports would surely disappear.

Mr. Walker: The responsibility for determining the place from which exports leave the country or imports arrive is largely that of the companies which ship products and the shippers. If they decide to use a particular port because it is more cost-effective than another, I hope that the port that has not been chosen will look carefully at whatever are the cost advantages, real or imagined, as seen by the shippers and shipping companies. We hope that all areas of Scottish activity, including ports, will adapt to meet the changing demands and conditions of the modern world, so that Scotland can compete not only with overseas ports but those elsewhere in the United Kingdom.

One cannot ignore recent trade history. Since its inception, the port authority has been obliged to face a number of dramatic changes in trade patterns. Like its predecessors, it has been compelled to adapt. The first of those changes was the implementation of full-scale containerisation on the world general cargo and liner trade routes. Those of us who witnessed that change occurring throughout the United Kingdom know that the ports that adapted quickly to containerisation thrived and grew, whereas ports that failed to adapt did not do so. Incidentally, I do not make any political, narrow, partisan points, because it is not that kind of Bill. It has the support of the Transport and General Workers Union, and of elected councillors, which I am delighted about.

Mr. Worthington: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Walker: The hon. Gentleman is rather impetuous. He does not allow anyone to complete a sentence.

I hope that Opposition Members accept that there is nothing narrow or partisan about the view that I take. Instead, I am concerned to see the Clyde develop in the best way possible. I was emphasising that unless one adapts quickly, and if restrictions are placed on the way in which a company or a trade union can operate, it serves as an impediment to change. Any impediment to change must present a disadvantage by comparison with ports that are able to change.

Dr. Godman: I point out to the hon. Gentleman that no impediments are being presented by the management or workers at the Kvaerner yard at Govan or at Yarrow. At both yards, management and workers are keen to win new orders. In the near future, Kvaerner may secure an order for three large vessels. That would be most useful to my constituents, because I fervently hope that Kincaid will build the engines for those vessels.

Mr. Walker: I trust that the hon. Gentleman is not suggesting that I stated that there are any impediments. I was only expressing the hope that right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House want to see the Clyde flourish—that we want it to adapt to meet the changing demands of today and tomorrow. We may differ on the route taken to achieve that. All the evidence from eastern Europe is that the capitalist, private-sector methods are far more efficient, create more jobs, and produce far more wealth than the narrow attitude that is the alternative, if I may put it that way.

Mr. Worthington: So the hon. Gentleman is being non-political.

Mr. Walker: I repeat, socialism does not work, and all the countries of eastern Europe are rejecting it. I was trying not to be partisan, but was responding to the narrow partisan points of Opposition Members. If they cannot take it, they should not make their points in the first place.

The Clyde port container terminal was constructed on the site of the Princes pier at Greenock and received its first ship on 15 March 1969. The terminal, with its depth of water of 42 ft at low tide, with a back-up area of 42 acres, and with rail connections to the major industrial centres of the United Kingdom, had by 1973 attracted 13 shipping lines. I hope that Opposition Members view those remarks as promoting the Clyde.

Events gradually overtook the north Atlantic trade. The hon. Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie), in his interesting speech, quite properly defended the interests of his constituents—even if it was at the cost of the constituents of some of his hon. Friends. There is nothing odd about that, because the hon. Gentleman has a track record for it. No one could ever accuse the hon. Gentleman of neglecting his constituency.

Dr. Godman: The hon. Gentleman mentioned the Clyde port container terminal, which is in my constituency. Everyone acknowledges that that terminal has seen bad times—largely brought about by fluctuations in maritime trade patterns. However, the vastly reduced number of men working at that terminal today are striving hard to increase its efficiency, and they are beginning to win.

Mr. Walker: I am delighted to hear that. I am not in any way being critical——

Dr. Godman: Yes, you are.

Mr. Walker: I am not. If the hon. Gentleman will read my speech tomorrow, he will see that I acknowledge, as does the hon. Member for Cunninghame, South, that the development of European trade in both directions is a substitute for what used to be the United Kingdom's major trade area in the north Atlantic. Anyone who doubts that trend need only study the changes in the trade patterns. One cannot blame the people working in the ports or the port employers for changing trade patterns. Whether one is trading in a port or in a high street, if one does not change to meet new patterns, one goes out of business. No right hon. or hon. Member wants to see Clyde port do that.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, South referred in particular to the importance of Hunterston to the west and the whole of Scotland. There is no question but that Hunterston and Ravenscraig depend on each other. In Hunterston, Scotland has a facility of which it can be proud. I look upon it much as I view Prestwick. Both are great Scottish assets. It is up to us as Scots to identify how we can best influence those facilities being maximised, to the benefit of Scotland. That is why I am distressed that so many foolish and sad things are said about Hunterston, Ravenscraig and Prestwick.

Mr. Foulkes: In the past, I have had cause to be grateful to the hon. Gentleman for all the positive things that he has said about Prestwick, for which he has been a doughty campaigner. Was it the Secretary of State for Scotland's U-turn on Prestwick that really turned the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) against him and led the hon. Gentleman to campaign for the present Secretary of State's replacement by the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth)? If so, that important milestone should be recorded. People should know about it. The primary responsibility belongs to the Secretary of State for Transport. He should be warned to look after his back.

Mr. Walker: I am fond of the hon. Gentleman in many ways. I hope that that does him no political harm. He has rightly drawn the attention of the House to the fact that we have joined together in campaigns in which we both believed. I should like to know what his views are on two-minute roof tax Donald. The Labour party has problems in Scotland. On which side of the fence does the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) fall? I shall go no further down that road. I have merely responded in kind to the hon. Gentleman's jibes.

The fact is that 50 per cent. of the Clyde port authority's traffic goes through Hunterston which represents 43 per cent. of its revenue. The Clyde port authority has a duty and a responsibility to ensure that the port is used to its fullest extent to benefit Scotland. Furthermore, Ravenscraig must continue to be the most cost-effective and productive plant that the British Steel Corporation owns. We must compliment the workers at Ravenscraig on their remarkable production performances.

Mr. Lambie: To take up the hon. Gentleman's point about Hunterston, my criticism of the Clyde port authority is that it has spent too much time on property development too little time on developing the harbour and port facilities, especially at Hunterston. If it had spent more time developing Hunterston instead of selling land in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), we might not have had to come here today to deal with this stupid Bill.

Mr. Walker: I shall try to answer the hon. Gentleman's question on the basis of principle rather than detail. I do not know what the Clyde port authority has been doing. In principle, however, it is up to any corporate body that owns land or property to maximise its assets for the benefit of the whole undertaking. That could mean selling off land for development so that the core part of the business can be successful. The core business may require substantial funds if it is to grow. It would be better to use asset funds, on which no interest has to be paid, for those developments rather than borrowed funds. I hope that the Clyde port authority has been using its assets to create the maximum advantage for the core part of the business. I believe that it probably has, since it appears to be profitable. That must be welcomed by us all.

The Clyde port authority board unanimously supported the use of the private Bill procedure. It must have considered a variety of options—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) is laughing. He sits on a board. I hope that the board on which he sits takes responsible decisions. If it does not, he and the other board members are failing in their statutory duty. Perhaps he is not unaware of a director's statutory duties.

I believe that in this case the board considered the options and decided unanimously to support the private Bill procedure. As it drew on the experience of so many interests, I have no hesitation in saying that I hope that the House will ensure that the Bill is given a Second Reading and is considered in Committee. If it does, Scotland's interests will have been well served.

The Clyde will continue to be an important port. The developments within Europe mean that trading patterns have changed, but during the next 30 years I believe that north Atlantic trade will be far more important that it has been during the past 20 years. Changes to the world's political power blocs will result in changes to trading patterns. It would be most unwise of us to run down this great national asset. I take the same view of the Clyde as I do of Prestwick—that we should look after and nurture it. If we do, it will still be there when trading patterns alter, as I believe they will. Too often in the past we have said, "If we had only known then what we know now." By then, however, it is too late.

Dr. Godman: With regard to the nurturing of the Clyde, is the hon. Gentleman satisfied with the assurances that have been given about continuing the dredging of the channel?

Mr. Walker: I am satisfied that the successor company will assume all the responsibilities of the present authority. On that basis, I assume that it will continue to do what has been done in the past. The Bill does not change the responsibilities; it merely gives them to the successor company. The statement says:

[Mr. Walker]

"The main purpose of the Bill is to provide for the transfer of the Port Authority's undertaking to a Companies Act company, ('the successor company'), with the consequential dissolution of the Port Authority. The successor company would at all times be a wholly owned subsidiary of another Companies Act company ('the holding company')".

The successor company will assume all the responsibilities of the Clyde port authority. The hon. Gentleman and his colleagues may not be satisfied that the authority would honour its responsibilities. However, the successor company would have to do so.

It is important to set up a holding company. That is the big difference. The holding company will be in the market place in a way that the Clyde port authority is not. It will have the opportunity to obtain funds, which the Clyde port authority cannot do. I should have thought that that would be of advantage to the Clyde.

If we are all interested in doing what is best for the Clyde—I hope that we are—I should have thought that experience has taught us that, if we do not change, we may end up with another albatross round our necks, and we do not want that.

Mr. Tony Worthington (Clydebank and Milngavie): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) who, in the past two or three minutes, gave us more explanation of the structure of the Bill than we were given by the presenter, the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). His explanation was off the top of his head, however, which is a remarkable sign of the contempt with which the House has been treated.

The Bill is of considerable importance, and the House should treat it with the seriousness it deserves. It concerns an authority that is responsible for 450 square miles—not only the port of Glasgow but the ports of Ardrossan and Hunterston, not to mention all the sea lochs around the Firth of Clyde. It seems that we are to approve on the nod a change in the way in which the port area is administered.

The hon. Member for Eastwood is usually the most affable of Members, but on this occasion he has treated the House with some contempt by failing to brief himself on the implications of the Bill. Tonight, he is in the position of a Minister; usually, Ministers presenting a Bill go through it and explain the implications of each clause. That the hon. Gentleman failed to do. All he gave us was a recitation from what I can only assume was a public relations brief of about two pages from the Clyde port authority. The hon. Gentleman completely failed to answer the questions that were put to him.

I object to the Bill not because I regard the Clyde port authority as a satisfactory body—I do not. I regard it as highly unsatisfactory, and I think that it should be restructured so as to reflect the interests of all the people of Scotland, not just those of the people who run the authority now.

Is the Clyde port authority a public or a private body? We do not know whether it is fish or fowl, whether it is operating in the commercial market or in the public sector.

It is also most unsatisfactory that the authority should be the responsibility of the Department of Transport—a fact that is not widely known. I suspect that most people in Scotland think that it is linked with the Scottish Office. I notice that sitting on the Government Front Bench is the third of a rapidly changing sequence of Ministers that we have seen during the passage of this Bill—the hon. Member for Edinburgh, West (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton). In theory, he is the Scottish Minister with responsibility for transport, but in practice his relationship with the Bill is peripheral. He has no brief for or interest in the matter. The Minister for Aviation and Shipping has apparently disappeared to an event that he considers of greater importance—

Mrs. Fyfe: Why?

Mr. Worthington: I do not know.

I have tabled parliamentary questions and written to the Minister at the Department of Transport about this matter. I asked:

"What means of redress or appeal exist in the case of maladministration or inefficiency by a body such as a port authority."

In other words, I asked what people can do if they think that a port authority is not doing its job. The Minister replied:

"Harbour authorities that are companies or statutory trusts are autonomous bodies running commercial undertakings. Any complaint should be made to the chief executive or chairman, and if satisfaction is not obtained the complaint can ultimately be pursued through the courts."—[Official Report, 2 November 1989; Vol. 159, c. 272-3.]

So one can do nothing about these bodies save appeal to the people running them.

We are talking about a collection of individuals who emerge through the strange processes of the selection of the great and the good to sit on these bodies. They are not appraised, and as far as I know the Department of Transport issues no reports on their past credibility. These bodies seem to go on and on, pursuing a course that may be good or that may be distinctly mediocre.

In November 1989 I wrote to the Minister about accountability, and he replied as follows:

"Once the Board members are appointed, however, they are entirely responsible for the day-to-day running of the Authority using their collective judgment of what is in the best interest of the port and operating within the terms of the governing parliamentary legislation".

So it appears that the board members, appointed by the Department, are not accountable. The Minister goes on to speak of the authorities' powers:

"In particular the 1965 Act provides that it is for the authority to decide whether to dispose of land, what price to seek and what conditions to impose on its release".

That power does not sound limited in the way that we heard it described earlier.

If Parliament had had any sense, we should first have considered whether the Clyde port authority had been operating efficiently and effectively. If we discovered that it had not been, we should then have considered what reforms to introduce. Instead, we have given the port authority—if it has done a bad job, this would seem wrong—the power to initiate its own legislation. At no point did the hon. Member for Eastwood provide us with an appraisal of the sort of job that the authority has done. Has it effectively developed the work of the area, or has it been ineffective? All we heard was a statement of what it wants to do. That is not an effective way of running a great port on an important estuary. We needed to hear an analysis of what the authority has been doing for the past 40 years and of what changes are necessary.

That seems to me to be going about things back to front. We have only the assertion by the Clyde port authority about what has gone wrong, rather than an independent analysis. I would have welcomed it if the National Audit Office—or some such organisation—had examined the way that the port authorities operate, and concluded that changes were necessary. We need a clear statement of what is being sought and of the responsibilities.

In his brief and perfunctory introduction to the Bill, the hon. Member for Eastwood—who is now about to be even more perfunctory, and leave the Chamber—stated that the powers of the Clyde port authority were restricted. However, he was unable to say in what way. The original legislation—the Clyde Port Authority Order Confirmation Act 1965—says what the duties and powers of the port authority will be. I shall read out those powers, because it is necessary for hon. Members to judge whether they are restrictive.

The Act says:

"It shall be the duty of the Port Authority, subject to the provisions of this Order, to take such steps from time to time as they may consider necessary for the maintenance or improvement of the port and the accommodation and facilities (including navigational facilities) afforded therein or in connection therewith".

The Act goes on to give what seem to be all-embracing powers. On page 8, section 15 says:

"The Port Authority . . . may . . . manage, use or develop land belonging to them as they think fit".

That does not seem to be restrictive.

The Act continues:

"in addition may with a view of selling or otherwise disposing of any right or interest in the land after the development is carried out . . . retain any part of land belonging to them . . . develop it or procure its development for use wholly or partly by other persons."

I am open to persuasion that the powers are too restrictive, but that does not seem to be the message from the Act.

Mr. Foulkes: It is not the message from me, either.

I appreciate the diligence with which my hon. Friend has gone into the matter to show the wide powers of the Clyde port authority. Earlier in his speech, he referred to navigation lights; if he thinks that the Clyde port authority has wide powers, he should put his tremendous energy into examining the Commissioners for Northern Lights. I have never come across a more powerful feudal organisation —I was going to say, on this side of the iron curtain; however, these days even on the other side of the iron curtain there are not such powerful organisations. When he has finished dealing with the Clyde port authority, will my hon. Friend have a wee go at the Commissioners for Northern Lights?

Mr. Worthington: I am graterful for that suggestion for my future work programme. I shall bear it in mind, and add it to the long list of fascinating subjects on to which my hon. Friend wishes to divert me.

I am not aware that the Clyde port authority has been unable to be involved in property development. It has been able to diversify from explicit port-related work on the Clyde. My hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) said that it had done that excessively, but there was no evidence that it was unable to develop the areas that were surplus to port requirements. Within Glasgow, I believe that there are areas that are the subject of development now: I may have missed a declaration on it, but I gather that in the Braehead area of Renfrew there is a proposed major shopping development awaiting the decision of the Secretary of State. The Clyde port authority has been involved with the Tarmac Group of Companies to develop it.

Let us take the Glasgow garden festival and the construction of the exhibition centre: the port authority has correctly realised that those developments should take place. I am not conscious of any restriction in its powers to stop it doing that effectively.

Dredging is another matter of concern. We have the right to ask the Minister and the hon. Member for Eastwood to clarify the power to dredge. Section 16 of the Clyde Port Authority Order Confirmation Act states:

"The Port Authority may from time to time"— there is the controversial "may" with which we always have difficulty—

"deepen, dredge, scour and improve the bed and foreshore of the river and firth of Clyde within the port or in or near any approach to the port".

There is a power whereby the port authority can use its resources to dredge, which is very different from saying that it "shall" always do what is necessary to enable the area to operate as a port. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Eastwood is still wandering around. He is using the old Scottish Tory device of moving around to make himself seem more numerous.

I am not reassured when the hon. Gentleman or the Clyde port authority says that nothing in the legislation changes the authority's powers. During the past 10 years, the authority has said to other bodies, such as the regional and district councils and the shipyards, "We may need to withdraw from this activity unless we are supported in the dredging." The hon. Member for Eastwood may by now in his travels have received advice on whether my reading of the Act is correct—that there is no duty on the port authority to dredge the Clyde and to maintain Glasgow as a port. I believe from my reading of the legislation that it could withdraw from that activity.

The Opposition realise the importance of not allowing the Clyde to silt up. I would assume that, because the port authority is in the public domain, public money would always be made available to maintain the Clyde. What will happen under a privatised company? The hon. Member for Eastwood may assure us that that the successor company—although he did not dignify his speech with technical terms such as "successor company"—inherits the same obligations as the Clyde port authority.

From my reading of the Act, I believe that it "may" dredge, not that it "shall" dredge and that it is open to a privatised company to up sticks at some stage and say that it is not in its commercial interests to dredge the Clyde. I am willing to give way to the hon. Member for Eastwood —he was generous to me earlier—if he wishes to assure me that the Bill maintains in perpetuity the duty on the Clyde port authority or the successor company to dredge the Clyde.

Dr. Godman: Does my hon. Friend agree that the dredging problem is exacerbated by the need for the Clyde port authority to purchase a new dredging vessel in the near future? Will not such a vessel cost several million pounds?

Mr. Worthington: I am grateful for my hon. Friend's intervention. It is realised that, if the Clyde is to be effectively dredged in the future, outdated equipment needs to be replaced. But that decision has been made by a public authority which realises the importance of its public duty to dredge the Clyde. Whether the successor company would make a commercial decision along those lines, I do not know.

Mr. Wilson: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is incredible, and deeply worrying, that the invitation that he offered so freely to the sponsor of the Bill was not taken up? Does he agree that Opposition Members' meeting with Clyde port authority representatives confirmed what he has said? There is no absolute obligation to dredge. Does my hon. Friend find it as incredible as I do that the sponsor of the Bill is not prepared to answer his question one way or the other?

Mr. Worthington: I am stunned by the failure of the hon. Member for Eastwood to know his Bill sufficiently well to give even that most basic reassurance. I am sure that, on being told that the Clyde port authority was to be privatised, the first question that Opposition Members would ask would be, do the arrangements safeguard the ability of the port of Glasgow to continue to operate as a port? It is difficult to continue as a port without one basic ingredient, which I have always thought to be water. If there is no water in a port, it is difficult to see how it can operate effectively. Yet the hon. Member for Eastwood seems quite unable to assure us that there will continue to be water in the port of Glasgow.

Mr. Lambie: Does my hon. Friend agree that the behaviour tonight of the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart) justifies the Prime Minister's sacking him as a Scottish Minister?

Mr. Allan Stewart: Answer.

Mr. Worthington: I would always defer to the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on these matters, as he seems to be the adviser on them.

We are told that the successor company will have the same powers. We need to know just what provisions have restricted the development of the company. We need that spelt out in much greater detail.

Page 9 of the Bill deals with the functions of the Clyde Port Holding Trust that is to be established. I regret that I have had to take so long on this subject, which could have been dealt with earlier by the hon. Member for Eastwood. Clause 13(2) says:

"(2) The Trust shall consist of a chairman, a deputy chairman, and not less than eight nor more than eleven other members.

(3) The persons who immediately before the first transfer day are the chairman, the deputy chairman and other members of the Port Authority shall become respectively the chairman, the deputy chairman and other members of the Trust".

In other words, the members of the port authority will succeed themselves. That is not usually what happens when someone dies.

Clause 14 says:

"The Trust shall . . . give to the holding company such directions as the Trust consider appropriate in respect of the matters in respect of which the Trust may give directions as mentioned in section 8".

That refers to the securities of the new company. Earlier, the Minister made a somewhat perfunctory statement, which we could not examine because he had departed, to the effect that half the proceeds of sale of the company were to go to the Treasury. However, we do not know why it should be half the proceeds, or the basis on which that was determined.

The trust is the key factor in setting up the holding company and the successor company. According to clause 14:

"The Trust may, in carrying out their functions in relation to the disposal of securities of the holding company, provide for one or more employees' share schemes to be established in respect of the holding company; and any such scheme may provide for the transfer of shares without consideration."

There is agreement on both sides of the House that employee share schemes are good. We want them to develop, but within egalitarian principles. We would want to ensure that there was a genuine co-operative venture, instead of half a dozen shares for someone on the ground floor of the company and several hundred thousand shares for the people at the top of the company.

I understand the phrase "without consideration" in clause 14 to mean free. Some of the shares in an employee share scheme should be transferred for free. I have no objection to that if that is done fairly, and that could be a good idea for the employees. However, clause 14(5) states:

"The Trust may transfer securities of the holding company without consideration"— that is, for free—

"to bona fide employees of that company or of a subsidiary of that company (including any such employees who are members of the Trust)."

The Clyde port authority board was established by statute and the members appointed by the Secretary of State. It is promoting legislation which transfers the affairs of the port authority to the Clyde Port Holding Trust which will set up the arrangements for the successor company and the holding company. It will also have the power to award itself shares.

It is clear that some present members of the Clyde port authority will become members of the trust. No one other than CPA members can become members of the trust. Those people are promoting legislation which will inevitably give them powers to allocate free shares to themselves in the new company.

Mr. Foulkes: That is better than winning the pools.

Mr. Worthington: I would not make that assertion, because it may not be a very important inheritance. It depends how moderate the trust is in its willingness to allocate to itself what was a public asset. We must also consider the lack of clarity about other members of the CPA and whether they are employees or whether the Clyde Port Holding Trust could designate those people as employees. Those people could receive a benefit in future.

It is unacceptable that a rambling Member of Parliament, the hon. Member for Eastwood, should present this private Bill in such a perfunctory way. The Bill does not make clear the provisions for the members of the promoting body. We have a right to know whether the CPA members will benefit financially from the proposal. If I have misread the Bill, I apologise for any mistaken inferences.

According to my reading of the Bill, the members of the Clyde port authority as presently constituted can, will and indeed must become the Clyde port trust, because no one else can do so. They can then decide the terms upon which employee share ownership will be distributed and they can then allocate shares to themselves "without consideration" —that is, without paying money for them. We have a right to an explanation of that, and I wish that there was a Minister on the Treasury Bench who could explain it.

I turn now to the importance of the meaning of "the Clyde" in the west of Scotland. We are not talking simply about a commercial undertaking. The Clyde is a most powerful symbol of the wholeness of life in the west of Scotland. It is a symbol of all the issues relating to the environment, tourism, commerce, leisure and sport. Therefore, in addition to the narrow commercial interests of the holding and successor companies, all those aspects need to be taken into account.

I referred earlier to dredging but that issue needs further consideration because of its general importance and the responsibility attaching to other bodies. At present, other contributing bodies include the regional council, which has been obliged or induced to contribute largely because of the importance of the Clyde to the sludge boats, which are the major daily users of the Clyde. They go up and down the river and out into the firth——

Mr. Lambie: And pollute the beaches of Ayrshire.

Mr. Worthington: Yes, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South has said, they pollute the beaches of Ayrshire.

That antiquated way of disposing of sewage has been questioned both by the European Community and by sane environmentalists. The regional council will be obliged to stop being involved in that activity. Eventually, therefore, the regional council will no longer need to use the Clyde for that activity. In addition, I understand that, under the provisions of another EC directive, dredging the Clyde and dumping the waste elsewhere is no longer regarded as acceptable, and that land-bound disposal methods must be used as well. Therefore, the regional council may lose its obligation and feel that it no longer has a duty to support dredging.

If I might correct my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), I understand that Glasgow district council has contributed £100,000 on a one-off basis. We all hope that Govan Shipbuilders and Yarrow Shipbuilders will continue into perpetuity, but nothing is absolutely certain in this world and those companies contribute substantially at present.

The main issue here is that a cost that used to be met entirely by the port authority is at present met only partially by that port authority, so I want to know who will carry out the dredging in the future in view of the cost of that activity. If I have to second-guess what will happen in 10 years—if the Bill becomes law—I imagine that the successor company will have walked away from those responsibilities, and I guess that some public authority will have to march in to pick up the cost of the dredging. It may be the regional council or the district council. A private Bill has been used as a mechanism for dumping a public obligation. It seems to be going through without being adequately examined.

A recent Strathclyde joint working party report, imaginatively called the "River Clyde Project" and, more poetically, "A corridor of growth", in which the region and associated districts—not just Glasgow, but Clydebank and Dumbarton on the north of the Clyde and, I assume, Renfrew and Inverclyde—took part. The Scottish Development Agency and the private industry group Scottish Action also took part, as well as the Clyde port authority. It was possible for those public organisations to come together to consider the Clyde as a whole and a strategic affair. They recognised that it was not the sort of project that was best dealt with piecemeal.

Earlier, the hon. Member for Tayside, North failed in his synopsis of world history to explain how Glasgow had been regenerated in recent years. One fact is absolutely certain—not a person in Britain could say that Glasgow had been regenerated by the workings of the market. There is not the slightest doubt that, where regeneration has occurred, it has been because of the actions of local authorities, where relevant, the Government—I pay tribute where that has happened—the Scottish Development Agency and other public organisations that have created the leverage that has led to private investment. Without that public investment in the first place, there would never have been any private investment.

I am worried that, with the Bill, we shall once again lose the ability to act strategically and consider the Clyde, all that river valley and estuary, in an overall context. That is an important power. We are talking about a 20 sq km area that can be developed for industry, housing or retail. The area will also be progressively more important in terms of water sports and leisure. We must ensure that the public interest is represented there, rather than the narrow commercial interest. If the port authority is given the freedom to develop on a purely commercial basis, that will be inadequate.

When considering the Bill—I hope that it will not receive a smooth passage through the House and the other place—we must ask whether it is genuinely geared to the interests of the people of the west of Scotland, because——

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I know that my hon. Friend is coming to his conclusion. I have listened to quite a bit of the debate, and no one has told the House where the demand is coming from. It is all right to say that there has been no opposition to the proposals from the Scottish Development Agency, the regional council or a number of organisations named by the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), who wants to keep Eastwood out of Glasgow, but not out of the port of Glasgow. But where is the demand coming from? Is it coming from the present board members of the Clyde port authority? If that is the only source, is that not a cause for the deepest of deep concern?

Mr. Worthington: I share that concern. As I said earlier, I am not rising in objection to the Bill, because I am satisfied with the present state of affairs in the Clyde port authority. I became interested in the affairs of the Clyde port authority because of its lack of action in the area covered by my constituency. Over many years, the Clyde port authority has simply allowed the Rothesay port area to become a tip. We did not really need any legislation to get an improvement. What we needed was a bit more activity by the port authority. In 1981, part of Clydebank was designated an enterprise zone. It was hoped that the special status of that zone would lead to a regeneration of Clydebank. I know that many hon. Members who go there will see that it has been transformed in many ways.

I give credit to the Government, the Scottish Development Agency, the regional council and the district council who have worked together to achieve enormous success in every part of Clydebank except the Rothesay dock area. In that area, the port authority failed to take action not because of any restrictions in the relevant Acts but because of lethargy. It simply failed to realise the potential of the area and hoped that something would come around the corner to cause change to occur in future.

Last year, the Rothesay dock area was to be regenerated by the import of coal. Hon. Members may remember the dispute last year between the South of Scotland electricity board and British Coal. Suddenly, the Rothesay dock was to be the means by which huge amounts of coal would be imported. That was not to be, and a simple letter such as the one that I sent to the SSEB established that there would not be such an amount of imported coal. The area could have been regenerated without any change in the legislation. That regeneration did not occur—not because of difficulties with the legislation but because of difficulties with the Clyde port authority.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): I have an interest in the Bill not only because of my Front-Bench role but because both Ardrossan and Hunterston are in my constituency. My main concern in the debate and in the weeks ahead is to ensure that the Bill, whether or not it becomes law, should be the subject of public debate. That has not happened in past months and that is why there is such strong opposition in the House to the Bill's simple passage.

Important points of principle are at stake and substantial public assets are to become private assets by means of this device. The House was entitled to more explanation and justification than we heard from the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart). His explanation for the Bill bordered on the insulting. It was completely inadequate and did not begin to deal in detail with the Bill or its clauses.

Mrs. Fyfe: Would my hon. Friend care to comment on the fact that the hon. Members for Brigg and Cleethorpes (Mr. Brown) and for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) are in the Chamber and that both of them were involved in similar Bills for other ports? Neither represents a Scottish constituency. Is there some strange community of interests on the other side of this debate?

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend takes me easily to the next part of my speech. It is vital to consider where this whole idea has come from. It has not come from the board of the Clyde port authority, year after year sitting in frustration, fretting over the lack of powers at its disposal.

I understand that the Minister for Aviation and Shipping had to leave the Chamber. He explained to me his reasons for that. In his brief contribution he rightly gave credit to the former Secretary of State for Transport, the right hon. Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon). The chairman's statement in the annual report of the Clyde port authority gives us the background to all this. It states:

"Back in 1988 the then Minister of Transport, Paul Channon, informed the trust ports that any request for increased powers would only be granted if the ports were prepared to accept a greater measure of accountability as in the case of a limited company to its shareholders. The preparation work in this has been very complex and time consuming for the authority's senior executive and we now look to the Government for their full support as the legislation progresses through Parliament."

The Bill is not a private initiative from the Clyde port authority, but a Government one. The work is being done for the Government by people such as the hon. Members for Eastwood, for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) and others who are involved with similar Bills. The demand does not come from the people who work on the Clyde or the communities located there which depend on that river for commerce, industry, leisure and other purposes.

The undoubted consequences of the legislation will be a further downgrading in the importance of the river Clyde and a greater emphasis being placed on the property development potential of its river banks. That is bad news for marine users and shipyard workers. It is a setback to the revival of the Clyde as a centre of marine trade. This is an enabling Bill that will enable a privatised company to turn public assets into private ones and to turn public sectors into centres of private speculators.

If the aims of the Bill are as stated I find it slightly odd that the Clyde port authority found it necessary to trawl entire west central Scotland to come up with the one Conservative Member to be found in that territory—and at that an hon. Member who has no direct interest in the river Clyde. The way in which the hon. Gentleman presented the Bill and the way he pranced round the Chamber, like the sugar plum fairy, in search of little bits of information to elaborate the bare bones of his opening speech, reflect no great credit on the Bill that he is seeking to promote.

We are dealing with substantial public assets. According to the balance sheet of the Clyde port authority for the year ended 31 December 1989, the total assets of the authority, less current liabilities, are £52,069,000. Conservative Members have given a slipshod performance and much of their debate has been light-hearted. A few of them have read from briefs and have had little of substance to say in defence of the case. In such a perfunctory manner is the House expected to hand over £52 million of public assets to a newly created private company? That is what Conservative Members are trying to push through.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) is right to point our that the people who will take over the running of that private company have been placed in their present positions of responsibility and trust to perform a public function rather than to run that private company. We believe that that must be exposed to far more rigid scrutiny than has so far been applied.

The only justification that the hon. Member for Eastwood gave for the Bill was that the existing remit and powers of the authority are so restrictive that it must cast them off to acquire great new liberating powers. My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie and other hon. Friends have already called that concept into serious question. My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie told us what the authority can do for better or worse and my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie) and other colleagues told us what the authority had not done when it was within its powers to act, had it had the will.

As a general rule, it is reasonable to say that a body which has not satisfactorily used, extended or lived up to its present powers should not come to the House lightly and demand a new set of powers which have the interesting side effect of turning it into a private company. It is worth quoting from clause 13(3) of the Bill, which states who will run the private company:

"The persons who immediately before the first transfer day are the chairman, the deputy chairman and other members of the Port Authority shall become respectively the chairman, the deputy chairman and other members of the Trust and shall, subject to the provision of this Act, continue in office until the Trust is dissolved by virtue of section 15 . . . of this Act."

Some people might think, "Nice work if you can get it." One day it is a public body with people appointed either by the Secretary of State or local authorities and others, and the next day they are the office bearers of a substantial private company which owns the assets that go with the River Clyde.

Opposition Members are not satisfied that the justification for the Bill lies in the restrictive powers that are alleged to exist under the present Act. If that is the case and if the powers of the Clyde port authority are so restricted that it cannot carry out work that it thinks is necessary, let it demonstrate that in the court of public opinion in succeeding months. As my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow said at the outset, we are going to have another go at the Bill, in the Lords. The authority has plenty of time to make that case and we will base our subsequent actions upon the manner in which it does so.

Mrs. Fyfe: It is surprising that when the hon. Member for Eastwood presented the Bill tonight and referred to the fact that a substantial amount of riparian land is involved and that there was considerable difficulty in developing joint ventures on riverside sites, at no time did he—or any of his hon. Friends—attempt to describe the benefits that could result. We are being asked to write a blank cheque tonight.

Mr. Wilson: I agree with my hon. Friend. I was astonished that the case was made so thinly. Practical examples probably could have been quoted to demonstrate how the extended powers could be used. The manner in which the hon. Member for Eastwood and the people who briefed him approached the debate shows that they did not feel that they had been called upon to give the House examples of how such extended powers could be used to their advantage. The hon. Member for Eastwood did not offer one example.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie tried generously, to encourage the hon. Member for Eastwood into an intervention. Perhaps he could give me a practical example now of something that has not been done if the authority had new powers. I would be pleased to hear a specific example.

Frankly, if the hon. Member for Eastwood sits there and cannot offer the House one example of what the Bill will achieve in practical terms, the House will make its own judgment.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow spoke ably about the local considerations in his constituency. He reminded us that we are not talking about an abstract or turning one sort of company into another, but about the life-blood of the community—the docks and the waterfront in Greenock. He also properly reminded us that it is Sir John Shaw Stewart's gift to the people of Greenock that is to be passed merrily on from one hand to the next without any regard to original intent. I find it rather odd that a party that is pleased to harp back to philanthropy by public-spirited citizens in bygone ages casts it all aside when it suits its commercial purpose in the present age. Sir John Shaw Stewart's gift is of no interest or relevance because the Conservative party has an immediate commercial purpose to fulfil.

My hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow and other hon. Members dealt fully with dredging, which is one of the most important aspects of the Bill. We are not passing comment on the people to whom the Clyde port authority will pass in the short term. I have no doubt that the people who have been running the Clyde port authority for the past two or three decades and whose life's work has been tied up with the Clyde will not, on the day that the authority becomes a private company, abandon responsibility for dredging the river.

We are not talking about that. We are talking about what might happen in one, two or three decades when they and we will have passed on. There is nothing in the Bill to stop the Clyde Port Authority plc being handed on to other concerns. With the way that riverside development is progressing not only in Britain but throughout the world, dealing more with property and less with waterways, what will a future company that owns the interests think about the responsibility to spend large sums of money every year dredging a river which, because of these policies, may by then be used even less than it is now?

A legal obligation to maintain dredging should be written into the Bill. As has been shown during the debate, those hon. Members who have spoken in favour of the Bill are under a misapprehension. There is no such obligation. As my hon. Friend the Member for Clydebank and Milngavie (Mr. Worthington) said, the word "may" is crucial. If a company's first commitment is to keeping the waterway alive and flourishing, it will do it. However, if its first commitment is to property development, with the traffic on the Clyde and the shipbuilding industry being only a secondary concern, it will have no obligation under the Bill to maintain the dredging of the Clyde. Without that obligation, what will be the consequences for the Clyde?

There is no constituency in Scotland more affected by the matters that we have been discussing than that of Govan in Glasgow. The people of Govan will be grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow for having spoken so eloquently on their behalf. He spoke also for the Kvaerner shipyard and about the crucial issues relating to the Govan constituency.

Mr. Foulkes: Why did my hon. Friend have to do that?

Mr. Wilson: I am astonished that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars) is not here. We can only speculate on where he may be——

Mr. Foulkes: Shopping?

Mr. Wilson: I think that Marks and Spencer closes early on a Monday night. Of course, the hon. Gentleman could be sharpening the knives for the Scottish National party leadership contest. For all I know, he could be polishing his cromag in anticipation of Bannockburn day.

Mr. Worthington: I am sorry that the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars) is not here, especially as his constituency and other constituencies have already been affected by the withdrawal of dredging operations between the Victoria and Glasgow bridges, which ceased about a quarter of a century ago. We can now see the extensive mudbanks in those locations. That that will be repeated lower down the river in the hon. Gentleman's constituency unless dredging continues was established in a report, commissioned by the regional council and others into the consequences of abandoning dredging, carried out by Babtie Shaw and Morton.

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend makes his point well. My hon. Friends the Members for Greenock and Port Glasgow and for Cunninghame, South (Mr. Lambie), who referred to the implications for shipyards, were not talking for narrow constituency interests. If anything, their constituency interests would be served by the upper Clyde becoming silted up.

Dr. Godman: There is a direct Greenock and Port Glasgow constituency interest in the Kvaerner shipyard at Govan. At this very moment, the men and women at Clark Kincaid in Greenock are building two engines for liquid petroleum gas carriers being built at Govan. If Kvaerner, with the support of the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars), obtains the order for three new vessels, it is extremely likely that Kincaid will build the engines.

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend provides an additional item of interesting information, emphasising the point that we in the Labour party speak together for all parts of the Clyde and do not seek to distinguish between one part and another.

Clearly, the dredging issue is of prime importance, and the least that we are entitled to ask for is that it should be a matter for public debate. I am disappointed that we have not heard more from some of the bodies that should have been briefing Opposition Members.

Mrs. Fyfe: Does my hon. Friend share my concern that when the cost of dredging has been raised in the debate, there has been no response from the Government Benches? My hon. Friends and I have expressed concern that although the new body may continue dredging, it is not known at what price to Govan shipyard in particular and to the local authorities.

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend's point is well made. We are not discussing a hypothetical matter that might arise at some future date. We know from our own discussions with the Clyde port authority that, even under the present arrangement, the sharing of dredging costs is a live issue. The shipyards must be persuaded that they have to meet the present level of cost.

I am pleased to acknowledge that Clyde port authority in its present form is fully committed to maintaining dredging and the marine use of the river. The hon. Member for Eastwood failed to address the question of what the situation will be when that authority no longer exists and its place taken by a plc whose prime interest is property development rather than the marine uses of the Clyde.

Mr. Lambie: If Clyde Port Authority plc becomes a land and property development speculator, would it not be in the interests of my hon. Friend and myself, as Members of Parliament representing Cunninghame, to see the ports of Hunterston and Ardrossan separated from the new company?

Mr. Wilson: I intended to refer to that matter later, but I shall do so now. My hon. Friend makes an interesting proposition. Long before I entered the House, I had a high regard for my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, South, and for his knowledge of and views on Hunterston. I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that the economic problems confronting north Ayrshire arise from the fact that the opportunity was never taken to develop Hunterston as it might be. It is ironic that the preface to the port authority's annual report makes reference to Hunterston as "deep-water port facilities which are among the finest of their kind in Western Europe."

I cannot help wondering where else in western Europe one would go to find other fine deep water facilities and at the same time discover such economic underdevelopment of their potential.

The same is true of Ardrossan. I am grateful for the £800,000 of development that has recently taken place there, and congratulate Clyde port authority on it. However, neither my hon. Friend for Cunninghame, South nor myself can ignore the years of neglect at Ardrossan and the steady rundown not only of cargo traffic but the various ferry services that used to run out of that port. I am conscious of the fact that, when new services are contemplated today, it seems to be Troon and Ayr that receive prominent mention as possible future ports for development. I hope that the new development at Ardrossan signals a more positive attitude towards it by the Clyde port authority, in whatever form. Cunninghame district council is examining the Bill and it would be interested in the possibility of Hunterston or Ardrossan opting out. It should be allowed to put forward its views. I want to encourage that kind of public debate.

We are all in favour of employee share ownership plans. However, the hon. Member for Eastwood knows as well as I do that there are ESOPs and ESOPs. In fact, there are ESOPs and fables. We see that in the bus context of Clydeside Wester, where there are two rival buy-outs. In the one case there would be genuine worker ownership; in the other, there would arguably be much less worker ownership.

This is an enabling Bill. It enables shares to be distributed unevenly. After the Bill is passed we shall probably find that a small number of people own a substantial proportion of the shares in the new Clyde Port Authority plc. We are entitled to a public debate. If it serves no other purpose, I hope that this debate, by means of the publicity that it attracts, will lead to public attention being focused on the Bill. That is long overdue. I do not doubt that, if the Bill had been introduced as a Government measure, it would have attracted far more public attention than it has received in its present guise. As it is a private Bill, it has so far crept through by stealth.

Most of those who will be directly affected by its provisions are worried about the Bill. The troops have probably been pulled in so that the hon. Member for Eastwood will obtain his 100 votes. Hon. Members have just come into the Chamber who were not here earlier. They would have a hard job trying to pinpoint the Clyde on a map of Britain, but they will vote for the Bill. Therefore, the hon. Member for Eastwood will gain a pyrrhic victory. The debate has served to highlight the questions of ownership and dredging. The hon. Member for Eastwood has been unable to answer them, but they will not go away. They will be asked increasingly in public as well as in private.

Mr. Worthington: Another issue that has not been fully explored is that of flooding and what will happen if dredging ceases. Is my hon. Friend aware that, according to the survey, the minimum level by which the height of the Clyde will rise if dredging ceases is 1 m?

Mr. Wilson: My hon. Friend has referred to another important issue. It may not seem important to hon. Members in 1990. However, it may be very important to those who live on the banks of the Clyde in the year 2020. That issue will also receive a public airing. Before the measure goes to another place I am sure that public interest in the Bill will have greatly increased.

Mr. Harry Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You have been in the Chair for a considerable time. I have listened to the debate throughout the entire time that you have occupied the Chair and I listened to it for a considerable period when your predecessor was in the Chair. As I have listened to the debate, I have become more and more concerned——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. What is the point of order?

Mr. Ewing: The point of order is that we have in our possession a House of Commons document. If certain hon. Members do not have it, it is available in the Vote Office. I make no complaint about that. However, the House of Commons document refers to——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. That is a matter for debate.

Mr. Allan Stewart rose in his place and claimed to move, That the Question be now put.

Mr. Harry Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Stewart: I beg to move, That the Question be now put.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I see that they have now put the Tellers in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Pakistan Bill [Lords], the Town and Country Planning Bill [Lords], the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Bill [Lords], the Planning (Consequential Provisions) Bill [Lords] and the Planning (Hazardous Substances) Bill [Lords] may be proceeded with, though opposed, unitl any hour.—[Mr. Sainsbury.]

Mr. Harry Ewing: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. You will have had plenty of time to think about my point of order because it is perfectly obvious. Can you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, as an occupant of the Chair, give me one example during all your time in Parliament and all your time as Mr. Deputy Speaker when you accepted a point of order in the middle of another point of order? When you have answered that, I shall raise another point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I have dealt with the hon. Gentleman's point of order. I remind him and the House that a point of order relating to a closure invariably takes precedence over anything else.

Mr. Ewing: You seem to make up the rules as you go along, Mr. Deputy Speaker—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] That has never happened before and it is totally unacceptable. I want to put on record my anger and disgust at the conduct of the Chair during the debate. I am very serious about this. Normally it is the occupant of the Chair who asks an hon. Member to retire from the House because of his or her conduct. I am leaving the House now in protest about the conduct of the Chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The matter that I have explained to the House is clear and it is of very long standing: a point of order relating to a closure invariably takes precedence.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Would it be fair to say that when an hon. Member moves a closure, that is a motion for a closure? If the hon. Member concerned raises a point of order, he places the Chair in the position of trying to take one point of order over another. Am I right in saying that all that the hon. Member had to do—which probably was not done in this case—was to move,

"That the Question be now put."?

Is not it wrong in principle, according to Standing Orders, for an hon. Member to rise on a point of order during another point of order? Would not it be better if the hon. Member concerned moved the closure as such, rather than on a point of order, so that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, could resolve the matter?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right. There is no need for an hon. Member to say, "On a point of order," before the closure is moved. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right about the procedure of which he has reminded the House.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Had you any indication from the sponsor of the Bill that he intended to move the closure, bearing in mind the fact that many of my hon. Friends still wanted to participate in the debate?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not disputing the judgment of the Chair. If a closure motion is moved, the Chair has to decide whether to accept it. It is then for the House to decide on the matter. All that the Chair has to decide is whether to accept the motion.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): On a point of order. Mr. Deputy Speaker. I have just heard a press report that the IRA has accepted responsibility for the bombing of an Army recruitment office in Halifax some weeks ago. As there has been silence from all quarters about who is responsible for that outrage, which could have resulted in civilian deaths, but fortunately did not, I am wondering whether you have been notified by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland that he intends to make a statement in the near future about the bombing and responsibility for it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. Lady has raised a serious point. It is not possible for a statement to be made now, but I am sure that what she has said has been heard by the Government Front Bench.

Orders of the Day

Pakistan Bill [Lords]

Order for Second Reading read.

The Parliamentary Under-Secondary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill's purpose is, I hope, welcome. It is to modify existing domestic legislation in order to place Pakistan on the same footing as other Commonwealth countries, following its return to the Commonwealth on 1 October of last year, after a decision by consensus of the other member countries, of the Commonwealth.

As became clear during discussion of the Bill in the other place last year, it also provides a reminder of the close relations between our two countries, and of the very considerable amount of good will towards Pakistan that exists in Britain. The relations between us are, of course, of long standing, but they are by no means purely historical. Pakistan is an important trading partner for Britain, and we are the largest overseas investor there. We have a major aid programme, with projects in irrigation and the social sector, among other areas. We consult and co-operate with Pakistan on a wide range of issues. The Pakistan Interior Minister was one of those who visited London for the world ministerial drugs summit held here at the beginning of April.

Pakistan is a major Islamic country. We particularly welcome Pakistan's return to the Commonwealth at this important time in the organisation's history. As we proceed with the high level review of the role of the Commonwealth in the 1990s, there will be much discussion between the secretariat and other members of the Commonwealth. We look forward to Pakistan's contribution to these discussions. Its renewed membership of the Commonwealth provides it with an additional and important forum in which to set out and exchange views at a time when developments in the world are taking place at a particularly rapid pace.

The return to democracy in many parts of the world has been one of the most encouraging developments of the last few months. Pakistan was some way ahead of recent events, returning to full democracy with elections in November 1988. We were particularly pleased to be able to welcome Prime Minister Bhutto to London a few months later, in July last year. That very successful visit included talks on many key issues. Mr. Speaker had the opportunity to see the Pakistan parliamentary system when he visited last autumn. since then, we received in January a senior delegation from the Pakistan Senate, headed by its leader, Mr. Sajjad.

One worrying note is the tension which has developed between Pakistan and India over Kashmir. As we have repeatedly made clear to both sides, we very much hope that that tension can be reduced, and that discussions between the two countries can provide some resolution of the situation. Neither country's interests can be served by continuing the dispute which has developed. We welcomed the meeting between the two Foreign Ministers in New York on 25 April, and their stated intention to keep contacts open at all levels. We shall continue to follow the situation there closely.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): The Minister has been referring to the serious dispute that exists between Pakistan and India over the future of Kashmir. Will he take this opportunity to declare on behalf of the British Government that they recognise that the struggle under way in Kashmir is a genuine struggle for self-determination by the people of Kashmir to determine the destiny of Kashmir? Will he, on behalf of the Government, recognise the status of that independence struggle?

Mr. Sainsbury: As the hon. Gentleman knows, Her Majesty's Government have made their position clear: they remain entirely neutral, seek a peaceful resolution and urge on both countries the avoidance of any force, and maximum restraint. We hope that they will follow the declaration made at Simla in 1972.

To return to the contents of the Bill, it is intended to amend a number of Acts in order to extend to Pakistan the provisions applying to other Commonwealth countries. It deals with Pakistan's relationship with the Commonwealth Institute. It reinstates the right of the Government of Pakistan to appoint a trustee to the board of the imperial war museum. It makes amendments to our legislation relating to the armed forces in order to define the legal status of Pakistan forces when, for example, training in this country. It provides for the exercise of command and discipline when British forces and Commonwealth forces are serving together, and for attachment of members of one force to another. It ensures that arrangements for the reciprocal enforcement of judgments with Pakistan remain in force.

The immigration and electoral implications of Pakistan's renewed membership of the Commonwealth were dealt with separately by an Order in Council made on 2 August last year. That added Pakistan to the list of Commonwealth countries given in schedule 3 to the British Nationality Act 1981. It is a technical Bill. I hope it is a welcome Bill, and I commend it to the House.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): On behalf of the Labour party I welcome the Bill and offer our support for its passage through the House.

It is almost exactly 17 years since I spoke in the House on the Second Reading of another Pakistan Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) is present; he took part in that debate on 22 May, 1973, which dealt with the consequences of Pakistan's decision to withdraw from the Commonwealth. I said then that it was a melancholy day, because we were having to pass legislation to provide for the withdrawal of Pakistan from the Commonwealth. I spoke of bidding farewell to Pakistan as a member of the Commonwealth, temporary though we hoped its departure would be. Having taken part in the debate on Pakistan's withdrawal from the Commonwealth, it gives me great personal satisfaction now to be able to take part in the debate on a Bill dealing with its return.

As the Under-Secretary of State has said, the provisions of the Bill are minor, but their implications are significant because, during the 17 years since we debated the previous Bill on Pakistan, that country has seen great changes. Democracy was swept aside in a way that caused great regret to those of us who have a great regard for Pakistan. The military rule is now over, and Pakistan has returned to full democracy in an election that gave great hope to all its friends. In electing a Government headed by Benazir Bhutto, Pakistan has dispelled the unfair and inaccurate stereotypes about Muslim attitudes towards woman by placing in office the first woman Head of Government in an Islamic country.

Benazir Bhutto has demonstrated courage, political sophistication and balanced judgment in carrying out her duties as Prime Minister. I hope to see progress in Pakistan for myself when I visit that country in a little over three months. Of course the country has problems. It has had the problem of coping with the influx of refugees from Afghanistan, and the way that it has coped was a remarkable achievement for a country which itself suffers from poverty. It faces a vexed situation in Kashmir. I hope to visit Kashmir when I get to Pakistan later this year. I trust that the Kashmir issue will be dealt with in a peaceful manner and that the solution will be acceptable to all the parties that are involved.

Conflict between two countries such as Pakistan and India would be viewed with horror in the House, especially in the Labour party, which was able to bring about independence for both Pakistan and India. We were particularly happy that both India and Bangladesh sponsored Pakistan's return to the Commonwealth.

Pakistan has problems of development. I was pleased to hear what the Under-Secretary of State had to say about British overseas aid for Pakistan. I hope that it will be possible to increase it, and that the framework of the Bill will make that possible. From a previous visit there, I know of the vigour and drive with which Pakistan and its citizens can take advantage of opportunities for progress. I know that from contacts with my constituents of Pakistani origin. In my constituency, I have the privilege of representing people who originated from many lands in addition to those whose origins as Mancunians and I had better add as Gortonians—you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will know the significance of not including Gortonians necessarily among Mancunians—go back through the centuries.

This country has been blessed by successive waves of immigration that go back to the Celts and Saxons. My constituency still has physical evidence of invasion by the Danes. Over the centuries, Manchester has readily received the Huguenots, the Jews—including in my constituency Chaim Weizman, first President of the state of Israel who lived at No. 57 Birchfields road—the Poles, who in Manchester as elsewhere, have just solemnley commemorated the 50th anniversary of the Katyn massacre, Afro-Caribbeans and, among numerous others, immigrants from the Indian sub-continent.

I am proud to represent them all, and I am happy to have built up close links with my constituents of Pakistani origin. I first knew some of them as babies, and they are now adults with babies of their own. Their parents and grandparents are my friends. I attend their weddings and other celebrations. I see the minaret of the mosque, the laying of the foundation stone of which I attended, from my bedroom window. I eat at their restaurants. On Wilmslow road in my constituency, we have more restaurants providing food from Pakistan, India and Bangladesh than can be found in any area of similar size, not only in Britain but, I am willing to bet, anywhere in Pakistan.

Pakistanis in Manchester reflect the fine traditions of the country from which they come. They work hard, they seek to give their children an excellent education and a good start in life, they respect their elders and they believe in a sound family life. They observe their religion and they celebrate Pakistan day and the birth of the prophet Mohammed. They watch Imran Khan play cricket at Old Trafford, and they are good Britains, loyal to this country while cherishing their land of origin.

I know that Pakistan's departure from the Commonwealth caused those people pain, and I know that its return causes them to rejoice. Many of them took British nationality and many took advantage of the right to possess dual nationality. Those who did not acquire United Kingdom nationality will now have the vote in Britain as Commonwealth citizens. As the Parliamentary Under-Secretary has said, that has already been provided for by Order in Council.

The Minister also spoke of the immigration implications of the Bill. I hope that the Government will think again about the way in which they administer the immigration rules. All of us who have constituents originating from Pakistan with relatives, spouses or would-be spouses there, know that they are often put through heart-rending ordeals because of the operation of the primary purpose rule, which separates families.

Pakistan is already playing an active part in the Commonwealth. Benazir Bhutto attended the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Kuala Lumpur in October, and she provided a valuable reinforcement to those at Kuala Lumpur and elsewhere who have argued in favour of sanctions against South Africa and demanded the dismantling of apartheid in that country. I am sure that Benazir Bhutto and the rest of her Government will play a continuing and constructive role in the work of the Commonwealth.

In October, at our party conference, I had great pleasure in welcoming a new addition to the diplomatic corps represented there, the excellent high commissioner for Pakistan. Until 1 October, he had previously been known to us all as the ambassador of Pakistan. The transformation was not simply in a title but in a whole relationship.

The United Kingdom and Pakistan have always been good friends. Now, once again, we are colleagues in a unique international partnership. That transformation is good news. The Bill is good news and I welcome it whole-heartedly.

[Mr. Gerald Kaufman]

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I have great pleasure in welcoming the Bill. It was a sad day in 1972 when Pakistan decided to leave the Commonwealth. I am sure that both sides of the House will agree about that and I am certain in retrospect that most Pakistanis will agree that it was the wrong thing to do at that time.

It was a great pleasure to find democracy restored to Pakistan in 1988. Those of us who know and love that part of the world thoroughly welcomed that change. It was therefore a memorable and special occasion when, in 1989, Pakistan was invited to return to the Commonwealth.

The visit of Miss Bhutto to this country in July of last year was a great success. It was heartening to find so many people in this country, not only those of Pakistani extraction, who welcomed her as a symbol of the new democracy now in that country. The expansion of free speech through the media, the trade unions and other channels must be welcomed by any true democrat, and all hon. Members now have the opportunity to express their pleasure at this development.

We have had a special relationship and an interest in that part of the world for a long time, which is why we are the major overseas investor in Pakistan, and the fourth largest trader. That is of special significance.

As has been said, we have a £25 million a year aid programme and we can expect that to be reviewed and improved now that democracy has been restored and so many other aspects of life are moving in the right direction.

A great deal of help and encouragement could be given, for example with literacy. The population of Pakistan has more than doubled since British rule of the sub-continent ceased, but the percentage of the population that is literate has declined. That is why it is so important for us to help encourage literacy.

Pakistan has a role to play within the Islamic community. As a key to stability among Islamic countries it is important, because it will help us to bridge many gaps. We can take advantage of our close relationship with Pakistan to make the introductions that are so important in the Islamic world. The fact that we can do so and that we hope to be able to enhance those relationships is encouraging.

We must all admire the fantastic job that Pakistan has done in looking after 3 million Afghan refugees. Hon. Members who have had the opportunity to visit the Afghan refugee camps will appreciate exactly how much has been done. They have assistance from the United Nations, but that covered only about half of the cost; the other half has been borne by the Pakistani people. Their hospitality to the neighbouring Afghans has been extraordinary and an example to the rest of the world of how to help others at a time of need.

We have all been exceptionally lucky in the high commissioner who was chosen to come to this country, Shaharyar Khan. He arrived here as an ambassador and has now become the high commissioner. It is a sign of Pakistan's maturity that a change was not made when democracy was introduced. The present Government accepted the ambassador who had previously been appointed because he is a highly competent and professional career diplomat and not a politician. In that capacity he has helped enormously to cement and enhance our relationship with Pakistan. I hope that he will remain with us for a long time and that eventually he is replaced by someone of equally high calibre. He is a great example of the sort of high commissioner whom we like to have in London, and he has made many positive contributions to the Pakistani community in this country and to alleviating its problems.

To my knowledge the high commissioner has conducted several advice bureaux in different parts of the country. He has been to my constituency, among others, to give the local Pakistani population an opportunity to make representations directly through him. That is unusual, and I do not know of any other high commissioner or ambassador who has provided such a service for people originating from overseas.

I wish finally to say a word about the major problem on the horizon—Kashmir. I am sure that Pakistan is determined that war will not be a consequence of this disagreement. However, it has a right to expect the matter to be resolved, and sooner rather than later. It is now more than 40 years since a United Nations resolution was passed, that there should be a plebiscite or referendum as a means of consulting the people of Kashmir on their future. The longer that this question is left, the more difficult it becomes because there will then be demands for independence, rather than a decision to join one country or the other.

Independence for Kashmir could cause weakness, whereas expressing a sincere and genuine choice to join one or the other of those countries must be a stronger answer. The people of Kashmir have as much right as others in the world to self-determination. That right has now spread to areas of Europe where, a year ago, we would not have thought it possible. Last year was especially momentous for people in eastern Europe as they achieved the right to self-determination——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I have allowed a wide debate, but I must be cautious about allowing it to turn into one about the right of independence for Kashmir.

Mr. Thorne: We wish Pakistan every success in overcoming its problems. She deserves not only our support but that of other countries and of the United Nations. I hope that the legislation is allowed to proceed to the statute book as quickly as possible.

Sir David Steel (Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale): In rising briefly to help to give all-party support to this measure, my brevity should not be taken as lacking in any way in sincerity or full support. I simply do not wish to go down the highways and byways of the excellent Pakistani restaurants in my constituency, although in the south of Scotland they are exceeded in number by the excellent Pakistani corner shops, which are much appreciated in the border towns.

It is welcome in all quarters of the House that Pakistan has returned to the Commonwealth. I agree with hon. Members that it would be a positive sign of good will by the British Government, which would be widely supported in the House, if our overseas aid programme to Pakistan were to be increased as a positive mark of recognition of that return to democracy. I am thinking especially of the crying need for additional help in the areas of health and welfare.

It was a delight to welcome Benazir Bhutto as the elected Head of Government, whom many of us knew in her days as a student politician in exile in this country. She is a serene leader—indeed, she has a degree of serenity that she might convey to other women Prime Ministers. I was pleased to meet her, together with the leader of my party, during her visit to London. I echo what other hon. Members have said about the splendid high commissioner for Pakistan.

Without wishing to try your patience, Mr. Deputy Speaker, on the subject of Kashmir, I shall say only that I very much wish that the fact that Pakistan has returned to the Commonwealth will, of itself, provide a forum in which the difficult tensions in Kashmir can be mitigated. It would surely be unthinkable that two Commonwealth partners should go to war again over that issue. In welcoming Pakistan's return to membership of the Commonwealth, with all the technical adjustments that the Bill makes, let us hope that we are doing something purposeful in averting what could be another tragedy.

Mr. Gary Waller (Keighley): I join other right hon. and hon. Members in welcoming the Bill, representing as it does the return of Pakistan to the Commonwealth—a development that many of us awaited with keen anticipation for a long time, and one that we greet with pleasure.

We welcome the return of democracy to Pakistan, recognising that it is not yet firmly established in the soil of that country but is a flower that we want to grow and flourish in the future.

Those right hon. and hon. Members who had the pleasure of meeting Prime Minister Bhutto when she visited Britain last year will recall the great impression that she made when she gave a speech in this building and at other locations. We recognised her great commitment to a democratic Pakistan.

Pakistan has enormous problems of law and order and with its economy. Many would like a return to military rule there, but those who saw in Benazir Bhutto qualities that we certainly recognise in this House hope that she will go on to fulfil the hopes of so many for the reforms to which she is committed. Progress has been slow during the past 18 months—as was bound to be the case—and there is a long way to go. However, all those who recognise the gradual improvement in relations between Britain and Pakistan will wish Benazir Bhutto well in her efforts to proceed with the support of her people.

One must acknowledge the significant part played by many people of Pakistani origin in the life of this country. The right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) spoke of the excellent activities of Pakistanis in Manchester. As one who was born in Yorkshire, and bearing in mind the great importance of cricket in the life of that county, I only hope that in future it will be possible for Yorkshire to win one or two battles of the roses with the help of players of Pakistan origin who were born in Yorkshire. I am sure that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will concur with that sentiment.

I echo the remarks of right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House on the extent of our good fortune in respect of the high commissioner for Pakistan at the Court of St. James. In the time that we have known Mr. Shaharyar Khan, we have come to realise not only the high esteem in which he is held by Pakistani communities throughout the country but that his work with the British-Pakistan parliamentary group has made it one of the strongest in the House. We look forward to Mr. Khan's continued residence in London for some considerable time to come.

The problems of Kashmir certainly present a challenge for Pakistan, and one that we should not underestimate. The commitment that any people have to their nation and to their belief in the right to self-determination should never be underestimated. I firmly believe that the people of Kashmir should be allowed to determine their own future through the plebiscite to which they believed themselves entitled by virtue of the 1948 United Nations resolution. I hope that, sooner or later, it will be implemented—and may that date be sooner, because the sooner it comes the greater the chance of a lasting peace in that region.

This is a great day for Pakistan. It may be a technical development, following the return of Pakistan to the Commonwealth last October. I understand that, when the Bill becomes law, it will be known as the Pakistan Act 1989, and the Bill will be deemed to have come into force on 1 October 1989. Today, therefore, we are giving effect to a development that has already taken place. We extend to the people of Pakistan the hand of friendship and co-operation. Pakistan, a country of 100 million people, has the potential to play its part in leading the world of Islam and the Indian sub-continent and to be a great force for good.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): I had the honour of first being elected Member of Parliament for Bradford, West in 1983. A third of my constituents are from the Indian sub-continent, and the vast majority are of Pakistani origin. I pay tribute to the contribution that my constituents of Pakistani origin have made to the economic, social and political life of this country. When Pakistan rejoined the Commonwealth last year, it was a source of great pleasure to my constituents of Pakistani origin.

I should declare an interest. Together with several other hon. Members, I am to receive an award from the President of Pakistan, the Hilal-i-Quaidi-i-Azam award, in recognition of the small contribution that we have made to restoration of democracy and human rights in Pakistan, fulfilled by the election of Prime Minister Bhutto and a democratically elected Government.

As a number of hon. Members have already said, our constituents of Pakistani origin are in many case British citizens. Whether the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) likes it or not, they maintain close links with their own country. They will read the report of the debate with care. I regret that this important debate is taking place at such a late hour. It should have taken place much earlier. I regret the inadequate opportunities that are afforded to hon. Members to debate the affairs of the Indian sub-continent in general. This is the first opportunity that we have had for many years to discuss the concerns of our constituents of Pakistani origin and the affairs of Pakistan.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am allowing a wide debate to be held on the subject, but I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not overlook the limited nature of the Bill.

Mr. Madden: Indeed not, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, as other hon. Members were allowed to stray widely, I hope that in an open-ended debate you will not seek to limit the amount of time that is allocated to those who speak later in the debate. That is yet another argument for the debate having been held earlier in the day.

My constituents of Pakistani origin resent the fact that many of their relatives and friends find it very difficult even to visit this country. They are also bitterly angry about the great difficulties they face in being reunited with their families in this country, due largely to delays in the immigration procedures, which are governed by Government rules which we shall debate tomorrow evening.

The latest changes bring further restrictions, delays and difficulties for constituents from overseas who seek to be reunited with their families. Serious administrative problems are still encountered at the British embassy in Islamabad. I am pleased that the Minister who has direct responsibility for that post is with us tonight. I hope that he will make further efforts to improve the administration of the visa section, which is the cause of much anxiety, inconvenience and distress for many hon. Members.

Many of our constituents of Pakistani origin have a great interest in the education of their children. They are ambitious for them and want them to learn, progress and prosper. I am delighted to see the academic achievements of many of our young constituents of Pakistani origin in the state-maintained sector. But I must say, on behalf of my many Muslim constituents, that equity demands that if the Government subsidise voluntary aided schools for Anglicans, Catholics and Jews, they should also subsidise voluntary aided schools for the children of Muslims, Hindus and Sikhs——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not see how these matters can conceivably arise under the Bill before the House.

Mr. Madden: Britain, like the Commonwealth, is a multiracial, multicultural, multi-faith society——

Mr. Deputy speaker: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that we are discussing a particular Bill; I very much hope that he will address his remarks more closely to it.

Mr. Madden: We are discussing a Bill, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about Pakistan. On behalf of my constituents of Pakistani origin I want to report to the House, on this rare opportunity to do so, the interests and anxieties of——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must tell the hon. Gentleman that I do not share his view about this being the appropriate opportunity to do that. This is not that opportunity.

Mr. Madden: As several hon. Members, not to mention the Minister, have noted, Mr. Deputy Speaker, when Pakistan rejoined the Commonwealth family of nations, a major Islamic country re-entered it. All Muslims are worried about the publication of "The Satanic Verses". As a result of the Bill, Muslims will undoubtedly give voice to their concerns about that book. The Minister rightly said that the anxieties of Muslims must be recognised, so we must acknowledge that great offence has been caused by the publication of this book. I urge the Minister to acknowledge the difficult situation that has resulted.

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): From that book or this Bill?

Mr. Madden: The Government Whip is muttering from a sedentary position. If I were not interrupted so often, I would be able to conclude my remarks much sooner.

I have suggested on many occasions that, if Salman Rushdie wants reconciliation and mutual understanding —here, and internationally—he should be encouraged to instruct his publishers not to print more editions——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. If I allowed the hon. Gentleman to make a speech along those lines, I should have no option but to allow other hon. Members to put an alternative point of view about the same matter. We should then find ourselves debating issues that have nothing whatever to do with the Bill.

Let me remind the hon. Gentleman that the explanatory memorandum states:

"The purpose of the Bill is to modify certain United Kingdom enactments to take account of the re-admission of Pakistan as a member of the Commonwealth on 1st October 1989."

I cannot see that has any connection with the publication, in this country or elsewhere, of a particular book.

Mr. Madden: This is my last word on the subject, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I hope that, if what I have suggested was done, it would bring about the end of the odious death threats against Mr. Rushdie, which I have continually condemned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is ignoring what I have just told him. I very much hope that he will have regard to it; if not, I must ask him to resume his seat.

Mr. Madden: Let me conclude my remarks by referring to a matter that every hon. Member has mentioned so far —the great anxiety about the future of Kashmir, and the consequent tension between India and Pakistan. That tension could result in war. This evening, in a Committee Room of the House—at a meeting attended by a number of hon. Members, some of whom are in the Chamber tonight—the high commissioner for Pakistan confirmed that Pakistan does not want and will not seek, now or at any time in the future, war with India over Kashmir. He said that Pakistan wanted the principle of self-determination to be upheld, and that Pakistan wanted to live in peace with all her neighbours.

I believe that that is an accurate version of Pakistan's position, which Pakistan will take with it into the Commonwealth. I hope very much—a number of hon. Members have said the same—that the Commonwealth and the Government will play a much more active role in seeking a resolution of the dispute over Kashmir than they seem to have done hitherto.

As I have told the Minister in other debates on the issue, I feel that the British Government can no longer maintain a position of neutrality over Kashmir. What is happening there can be seen in Lithuania and other parts of eastern Europe—and, indeed, in a number of other countries. It is a genuine struggle by the people for the right to determine their own destiny and that of their own country—a struggle for independence. It is wrong to see that struggle, as some hon. Members do, as a choice between remaining part of India and joining Pakistan.

There is a third option: the option of independence——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman heard me reproach the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) on this very point. We are not debating whether Kashmir has a right to self-determination. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not pursue that line.

Mr. Madden: It is extraordinary if an issue which directly affects two Commonwealth countries—Pakistan and India—and which may plunge them and the region into war cannot be raised by me or any other Member in a debate of this sort. I find it——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Member will recognise that it is my duty to ensure that the Standing Orders and procedures of the House are observed. We are debating a Bill that is clearly defined. We have had a wide debate, but there are certain limits. I must ask the hon. Member to recognise them and not challenge my ruling.

Mr. Madden: Several hundred people in Kashmir have been killed and hundreds more injured. They are suffering from virtually round-the-clock curfews which have gone on for months. There are shortages of food and water. People are sheltering in mosques for fear of death, injury and rape. There are shortages of medical supplies. Soldiers turn away people who wish to get medical treatment in hospitals. If that is not a matter that should be reported to the House, I do not know what should be. I do not——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I do not question the gravity of the matters to which the hon. Member refers, but I must question the propriety of raising them in this debate. It is my duty to confine the debate to the Bill before the House. The hon. Member must seek some other opportunity to raise the serious matters that he is bringing to the attention of the House.

Mr. Madden: This matter will not go away. Frankly, it is much more important than the parliamentary rules and procedures of the House. I shall seek every opportunity to report to the House what is happening in Kashmir, because historically the House and this country have great responsibility for the boundaries that were drawn and for the partition of India and Pakistan. We cannot abdicate. That is why a position of neutrality is wholly irresponsible and why it will be quickly swept away. The people whom we represent are worried about these matters, even if the House of Commons is not.

Mr. Patrick Ground (Feltham and Heston): Like other hon. Members, I join in welcoming the return of Pakistan to democratic government. I share the admiration that has been expressed for the way in which Pakistan has welcomed so many refugees from Afghanistan. I admire the role that Pakistan families are playing in the life of this country.

The Bill reflects the return of Pakistan to normality within the Commonwealth, but one matter concerns me and many of my constituents—the treatment that is accorded to Ahmadi families in Pakistan. As our relationships with Pakistan become more normal and as the law enforcement provisions in the Bill become effective, that matter will become even more worrying to many people, including my constituents, whose relations had their homes in Pakistan burned in April 1989. The Pakistan constitution guarantees equal treatment in law, protection of life and property and the liberty of each citizen. It recognises that Governments are under a duty to protect every citizen, especially those who are victimised because of their beliefs.

There are signs that the police knew in advance of the incidents that took place in April 1989. They gave an assurance that the police forces had been adequately reinforced. Nevertheless, about 25 houses were burnt down or grossly damaged, with no sign of any effort being made by the police to offer protection to the Ahmadi families. The same pattern was repeated in adjoining villages.

The story has been documented by the human rights commission of Pakistan, and no doubt the document describing the events in Nankana Sahib on 12 April 1989 will be available in the Library for hon. Members to see. My constituents whose families have been affected by the incidents tell me that there have been no prosecutions of the people concerned, that no compensation has been paid and that there is no sign of the Pakistani Government doing anything to alleviate the persecution of the Ahmadi Muslims in Pakistan.

I understand from correspondence with Foreign Office Ministers that they have made it clear that the British Government regard such persecutions as repugnant. The Minister of State told me that the Government have made their views clear to the Pakistan Government on a number of occasions.

At a time when we are welcoming Pakistan into the Commonwealth and acknowledging the good things that the country has done, it is important that we should place on record our concerns about such persecutions and make it clear that we shall continue to express our concern until that blemish in Pakistan's conduct is removed as we hope that it will be removed. A country that has shown such generosity of spirit in its behaviour towards the Afghan refugees and a religion with an old and well-established tradition of toleration and respect for other beliefs can surely improve its conduct towards a small sect——

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): I am following with interest the hon. and learned Gentleman's argument, and I do not dispute what he says. A great many members of the Ahmadiyya community live in my constituency. But does not agree that, under the premiership of Benazir Bhutto, a much more progressive attitude is being adopted to those people and their religion than was ever adopted when the military controlled Pakistan?

Mr. Ground: I hope that the hon. Gentleman is right, but my constituents who discuss the matter with me say that they do not see any great sign of improvement. The incident to which I referred took place in 1989, after the accession of the present Prime Minister of Pakistan, and there were further ugly incidents in July 1989 during which a number of Ahmadis were killed in another part of Pakistan. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is right. Certainly Benazir Bhutto has inherited many problems and is grappling heroically with many of them. But this is one problem that must be grappled with and I hope that the House will join me in expressing the hope that the blemish to which I have referred will be removed from the conduct of Pakistan and that the concerns felt by so many of our constituents belonging to the sect will be alleviated as time goes on.

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): Like all hon. Members who have spoken in the debate, I warmly welcome the Bill. Those of us who have followed events in Pakistan for many years—certainly while, for too long, it was under the control of the military—will have despaired of that country's ever returning to democracy.

Those of us who applauded and supported Benazir Bhutto when she campaigned against the military have followed her role with great interest and admiration since she became Prime Minister. As the hon. and learned Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) said, she inherited many problems and, sadly, she still has many problems. However, the stability that is returning to that great country of Pakistan is without doubt due in great part to Benazir Bhutto's heroic leadership.

Hon. Members have already referred to the problems facing Pakistan. In common with many hon. Members, I have a large Pakistani community in my constituency. Many of them are second or third-generation Pakistanis. Although their parents were born in Pakistan, their sons, their daughters and their grandchildren have been born in this country. The role that they have played for many years, and the role that they seek to play now, has been a great asset for this country. I have close contacts with the Pakistani community in my constituency and hon. Members will be aware, as I am aware, of the valuable role that they play in many aspects of day-to-day life. I know from recent events, including Pakistani socials and weddings, how much they have welcomed the re-entry of their country into the Commonwealth.

I believe that, if someone deserves credit, it does not matter how often that is referred to. Pakistan and this country have been fortunate to have a high commissioner of the quality and diplomatic skills displayed by the Pakistani high commissioner to the United Kingdom. He is an honourable, fine, outgoing diplomat. Those of us who have come into regular contact with him in our capacity as active members of the Anglo-Pakistani group in the House are aware of the role that he has played and will no doubt continue to play. Like other hon. Members, I pay the warmest tribute to him.

I note the comments that you made earlier, Mr. Deputy Speaker, about the width of debate that we are allowed. However, now that Pakistan is once again a member of the Commonwealth, our constituents expect certain things to happen. They look to the British Government to be more sympathetic to the kind of problems that Pakistan faces as a member of the British Commonwealth. Reference has already been made to the courageous attitude of the Pakistani Government to the people of Afghanistan. Pakistan is not wealthy, and it faces many problems of its own. However, it did not once question whether it was able to take in refugees from Afghanistan. It opened its doors and brought in many people, at great suffering and cost to Pakistan.

I ask the Minister to take note of those problems. I hope that he will convey to his right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development the need for outgoing help, especially financial outgoing help, for Pakistan.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) referred to the difficulty of entry to this country facing people from Pakistan. Again we must remember that Pakistan is a member of the British Commonwealth. Irrespective of party, I am sure that many other hon. Members will find, as I have, that our constituents feel that, if their country belongs to the Commonwealth, and they follow the laws, they are entitled to expect what they regard as certain rights.

I believe that the next point is for the Minister to answer. As letters about people living in Pakistan, which I send to the Home Office, are invariably sent to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, I assume that this matter is his responsibility.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) has said, often people cannot win under the existing system. If they are young and seek to come here for a holiday, they are told, "We are not allowing you entry because we do not believe that you will leave at the end of the required period of your visit." If, on the other hand, they are elderly people who want to come here to visit their sons and daughters, they are told, "You are so elderly that you would not want to go back to Pakistan." This causes bitterness in our constituencies.

Like all hon. Members, I have no objection to rules if they are fairly followed, but we often get the opposite impression. In fact, I heard about a case over the telephone today, which will land on the desk of the appropriate Minister at the Foreign and Commonwealth Office either tomorrow or the day after—I believe that it is the hon. Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury). My constituent outlined the case of his niece who wanted to come here for a three-month holiday, but has been refused on the grounds, "We are sure that, at the end of the three-month holiday, she will not return."

We all welcome Pakistan back into the Commonwealth. It has a great deal to offer the Commonwealth, but we in the United Kingdom—and especially the Government—must show our commitment to countries such as Pakistan. It is now time that the Minister seriously looked at the attitudes of entry certificate officers in the various high commission offices in Pakistan.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): Does my hon. Friend agree with me about another example of the bad policy operated by the Government on such matters? Does he agree that, where DNA testing proves that a wrong decision was taken in the past on an entry application, that decision should now be put right regardless of the age of the applicant?

Mr. Cox: My hon. Friend has made a valuable point, but I shall not pursue it, because I might encounter your displeasure, Mr. Deputy Speaker. However, I ask the Minister to discuss that point with his officials, not only here, but especially in Pakistan. If, when he replies, he can give us the assurance that he will look seriously at the points that many hon. Members have made—irrespective of party—it would show our constituents and the Government of Pakistan not only that we welcome Pakistan back into the Commonwealth, but that we shall now start to put right any wrongs that we have committed as a country, possibly under successive Governments. If we do that, although this debate may have been restricted in a way that many of us have not liked, it will nevertheless have been of great benefit.

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): I join hon. Members of all parties in welcoming Pakistan's return to the Commonwealth, and especially to democracy.

I listened carefully to the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) and must take issue with him on one point. He spoke about "the stability" in Pakistan. I am afraid that the position in Pakistan is not stable and has not been stable for sometime, and that Pakistan does not show any particular signs of returning to stability in the near future, although that is something for which we must all hope.

I shall be brief and when I say that I shall conclude, I shall, indeed, conclude. Having heard your strictures, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I shall not say much about Kashmir, although I had intended to quote at length from an article in The Times of 8 May, which was headed:

"Indian crackdown turns Kashmir into fortress."

I shall merely say that if you happened, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to fly from India to Pakistan, you would travel from one democracy to another. The chances are, however, that you would fly over a territory whose people do not enjoy a democracy and do not have the right to self-determination. Those people should have the right of self-determination, which they were first told that they should have at the United Nations in 1948. They still do not have it, and too much time has passed.

I conclude as I began, by saying that I welcome Pakistan's return to the Commonwealth and rejoice in its return to democracy.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I join other hon. Members in welcoming Pakistan back into the Commonwealth of nations and its return to democracy. The whole House should support Benazir Bhutto as she faces the difficult task of holding together democracy in Pakistan.

I welcome the end of the suffering of many women in Pakistan. Under General Zia, women suffered especially with the passing of the Hadood ordinances. Those severe laws had a significant effect on women's rights. When we talk about democracy in Pakistan we should bear in mind the fact that the ordinances have not been fully revoked; but at least their implementation has been suspended under the new Government.

I support the pleas for more humane treatment of Pakistanis who visit the United Kingdom. I have in mind especially the women of Pakistani families living in this country who are seeking to bring their husbands or fiancés here to live with them and to share a life together. They face a great problem. Trick questions in interviews often work against people who have a language difficulty and are extremely anxious. If they are unable satisfactorily to meet the terms of the interview they may be unable to share a life with their loved one in this country. Pain and suffering is caused when families are kept apart by what I consider to be inhumane immigration laws.

Can the House debate the Bill in peace and tranquillity while the people of Kashmir suffer indiscriminate killings, arbitrary arrests, unlawful searches, unprovoked assaults as a result of peaceful demonstrations and a complete disruption of their normal lives? Many Kashmiris have suffered the imposition of an indefinite curfew for months. The are denied basic human rights. Surely it is time to debate the position in Kashmir. I know that you would rule me out of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, if I attempted to introduce that issue in this debate. None the less, I feel that such a debate is long overdue. The Minister quoted the Simla agreement of 1972, but no Kashmiri representatives were consulted on or involved in that agreement between India and Pakistan.

Of course the Kashmir people want independence and the right of self-determination. Kashmir is not part of India or of Pakistan. The right of self-determination for 10 million people is something that the House should take extremely seriously.

I welcome the fragile democracy that exists in Pakistan. I also welcome the fact that Pakistan is back within the Commonwealth. I urge the Minister, and the Government as a whole, to take seriously what is happening in Kashmir, which is resulting in great suffering. I beg for an urgent debate on Kashmir on an occasion when you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will not rule me out of order.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): It is a great pleasure, even at this hour, to say a few words in reply to what has been an excellent debate. A measure of the importance of the subject, and of our concern about improving relations between our two countries, is the number of hon. Members on both sides of the House who have participated in the debate even at this —as my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) described it—ungodly hour. It is notable that those who have participated have included the principal official Opposition spokesman and the foreign affairs spokesman for the Liberal Democrats. I am afraid that I do not have the knowledge and experience to go down the gastronomical and matrimonial byways of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), so I shall concentrate on the five themes that seem to have emerged from the debate.

First, there has been a universal welcome for the Bill and, above all, for the return of Pakistan to the Commonwealth after a gap of 17 years. The Opposition are still positive about the Commonwealth, and none of the cynicism that seems to be beginning to creep in among Conservative Members exists among the Opposition.

Secondly, during the debate we have heard widespread respect and affection, which I share, for Benazir Bhutto, the Prime Minister of Pakistan. I had the privilege of meeting her when she visited in July, as did many other hon. Members. As one or two hon. Members said, she does not have to seek out the problems in Pakistan, and we wish her well in overcoming them.

The third theme is the need for the United Kingdom Government to increase our aid and assistance to Pakistan, in recognition not only of its membership of the Commonwealth and return to democracy, but of its needs. That was said eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) and also the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne). It is truly an all-party request to the Minister. On behalf of the official Opposition, I hope that the Minister will pass on to his right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development that strong view, which has emerged from both sides of the House.

The fourth theme is the high regard in which all hon. Members, including myself, hold the high commissioner of Pakistan.

The fifth theme is concern about the position in Kashmir. Sometimes, when considering our problems in this not so United Kingdom, I recall the parable of the motes and beams. It is always easier to deal with other people's problems than one's own. The Opposition believe strongly that the problem of Kashmir should be resolved by discussion, not conflict. We hope that that difficult problem will not result once again in conflict between two countries, now two members of the Commonwealth. We hope that the Government will do all in their power to ensure that that does not happen.

The hon. Member for Ilford, South spoke eloquently. He is an active member of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, as is my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting. Pakistan will now rejoin the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association. I want to emphasise the importance of parliamentary contacts in re-establishing and further developing relations between our two countries.

My hon. Friends the Members for Bradford, West, for Tooting and for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) all raised the issue of the difficulties experienced by people in Pakistan, particularly relatives of their constituents and relatives of others in the United Kingdom, in visiting this country. That was raised at Foreign Office Question Time, when several of my colleagues and I pressed the Minister strongly on that matter. The Minister's reply, although courteous, was not satisfactory. I urge him again to consider a sysematic review of the procedures and staffing at visa section not just in Pakistan, although that is important and relevant in this context, but in other parts of the Commonwealth.

The debate has been positive. As I said, a number of themes have come through strongly and we have all welcomed Pakistan back to the Commonwealth. The other place had a debate on this matter at midday, approaching Christmas, and perhaps our debate has not been as ebullient as that debate. However, it has certainly been serious and positive. I hope that the Minister will take from it some of the positive themes and translate them into policy. If he does that, he will certainly have the whole-hearted support of the Opposition.

Mr. Sainsbury: The debate has been excellent and a rare degree of unanimity has been displayed by hon. Members in all parts of the House in welcoming not only the Bill but the return of Pakistan to the Commonwealth and democracy.

I am happy to echo the words of praise for the Prime Minister of Pakistan, Benazir Bhutto, for her contribution to her country. I am also happy fully to endorse the tributes paid by many hon. Members to the Pakistan high commissioner for his excellent contribution to United Kingdom-Pakistan relations. That was mentioned by my hon. Friends the Members for Ilford, South (Mr. Throne) and for Keighley (Mr. Waller), the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel), the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman), the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) and others.

Some hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley (Mr. Foulkes) spoke about aid. The aid programme to Pakistan has increased since the country's re-entry to the Commonwealth. It is planned to increase aid to £29 million this year and the bilateral aid programme has doubled in the past five years. It has increased from £18 million two years ago to £23 million last year and is our third largest programme in Asia.

We are increasing our contribution to the Commonwealth scholarship fellowship plan which we hope will enable the Commonwealth Scholarship Commission in the United Kingdom to provide a number of awards for Pakistan.

All 11 right hon. and hon. Members who spoke in the debate referred to Kashmir. I shall not incur your wrath, Mr. Deputy Speaker, by speaking at length on that matter, but I should like to emphasise that Britain's position of neutrality on the issue in no way implies indifference. Our long-standing position on Kashmir remains unchanged. We think that the dispute over the status of Kashmir can be settled only between the Governments of India and Pakistan, but we have made it clear that we would be prepared to play a role in settling the dispute if both sides wanted us to do that.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Feltham and Heston (Mr. Ground) spoke about the treatment of the Ahmadi community. We have long been concerned about that and have made our views clear. I assure my hon. and learned Friend that we shall continue to do that as and when appropriate.

Some hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), spoke about immigration. As I think most of them know, immigration policy is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. It is a Home Department responsibility, and administration of that policy overseas is a matter for the Foreign and Commonwealth Office. However, I shall certainly look at the points made by hon. Members on immigration matters. I emphasise that about 90 per cent. of applications for visit visas are dealt with within 24 hours and we continually examine our procedures. We have been streamlining procedures in Islamabad to reduce queues.

Many hon. Members referred to the contribution made to the life of our country by citizens of Pakistani origin —corner shops were mentioned, as well as restaurants up and down the Wilmslow road. I thought for a moment that the right hon. Member for Gorton was rehearsing for a maiden speech when he waxed so eloquent about everything in Gortonia.

There is one issue of contention in the debate. I was rather concerned when Manchester and Lancashire tried to claim Imran Khan. I should remind the right hon. Member for Gorton that Imran Khan was a distinguished captain and player for Sussex, whose home ground I can see from my sitting room, if not from my bedroom, which faces the other way.

This has been an excellent debate and I thank all right hon. and hon. Members who contributed. The quality of the debate is a testimony to the value in which we hold Pakistan, the good wishes we have for her and the welcome we extend on her return to the Commonwealth and democracy.

I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read a Second time and committed to a Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills).

Town and Country Planning Bill [Lords]

11.50 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas Lyell): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

There are four Bills relating to town and country planning matters before the House and, with permission, I shall speak to all four, as they should be considered as a unity.

The four Bills, taken together, amount to a consolidating measure. The Town and Country Planning Act 1971 was the last major consolidation of the Town and Country Planning Acts. The 1971 Act has been considerably amended by primary legislation, including the Town and Country Planning (Amendment) Act 1972, the Local Government Acts of 1972 and 1985, the Land Compensation Act 1973, and the Town and Country Planning Act 1984.

The result of the constant addition of material into the text of the 1971 Act and the repeal of extensive parts of it has been a loss of coherent structure. That is especially apparent in part IV of the 1971 Act dealing with special controls. The system of controls relating to listed buildings and conservation areas and to hazardous substances are so voluminous as to justify whole Bills relating to those topics alone. They have therefore been consolidated separately in the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservation Areas) Bill and the Planning (Hazardous Substances) Bill.

In other respects, there is a broad correspondence between the Town and Country Planning Bill and the 1971 Act. The only difference is the creation of a new part which relates to Crown land and includes material from the Town and Country Planning Act 1984 and the Building Restrictions (War-time Contraventions) Act 1946. Finally, the Planning (Consequential Provisions) Bill, which is ancillary to the other three, deals with a number of technical and transitional matters, including repeals and consequential amendments.

In preparing the consolidation, the Law Commission issued a report in which it made a number of recommendations for amendments to and minor clarifications of the existing legislation, and those amendments appear in the Bills. All four Bills were referred in the usual way to the Joint Committee and on Consolidation Bills &c. during their passage in another place. The Committee reported that the recommendations of the Law Commission were necessary to produce a satisfactory consolidation of the law and that the four Bills, taken together, amounted to a single consolidation.

I should tell the House that a small number of further amendments will be brought forward.

As always, our thanks are due to the Law Commission and to the draftsmen for their excellent work in the process of keeping the statute book in modern and accessible form.

I commend the Bills to the House.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): As usual, one welcomes consolidation legislation as it makes life easier for practitioners. This set of four Bills is a remarkable achievement.

Is the progress of consolidation now being speeded up by putting statutes and amendments to them on the equivalent of a word processor, albeit an extremely large one? Are statutes being computerised to any degree to make that process easier and quicker in relation to the Bills before us and other heavy, voluminous, much-amended legislation that will come before us from time to time?

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I did not know whether you were going to call me, Mr. Deputy Speaker

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): The Standing Order says that the hon. Gentleman must rise in his place. His place is not in the middle of the Chamber. Does the hon. Member wish to speak?

Mr. Haynes: Are you having a go at me, Mr. Deputy Speaker? I am sorry. I get carried away from time to time when you are in the Chair. I wanted to contribute. I am not pulling your leg. I want to have a go at the Solicitor-General, because he is talking about hazardous substances. From time to time, I have had a go at the Secretary of State for the Environment because we have problems in my area——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to check the hon. Member, but I am bound to tell him that we are discussing a consolidation measure and we cannot discuss the merits of the contents of Bills which are the subject of consolidation. We can only discuss whether it is appropriate to consolidate at this time. The hon. Member cannot discuss hazardous substances now. He has to look for another opportunity.

Mr. Haynes: I accept your ruling, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and I fully understand, but the consolidation measure is hiding a problem back home in my constituency, and I want to express myself here tonight.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, but the hon. Member will not be allowed to express himself on that subject tonight. If he seeks an early opportunity, I am sure that Mr. Speaker will look favourably on an Adjournment debate application. I wish that the hon. Member would not keep smiling at me in that way. I doubt whether the matter which he wishes to raise would be in order if he persisted in seeking to raise it. I hope that we will now allow me to put the question.

Mr. Haynes: I accept what you say, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I hope that you will put in a good word for me upstairs.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102(5) (Standing Committees on European Community documents)

COMMUNITY FINANCIAL PERSPECTIVE

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 4963/90 plus COR 1 relating to revision and adjustment of the Community's financial perspective and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by Her Majesty's Treasury on 30th March 1990.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

Community Charge

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

11.57 pm

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): My purpose in calling for this debate is twofold. First, I wish to raise some of the concerns and problems which many of my constituents have about the community charge. Secondly, now that the Government are committed to carrying out a review of the operation of the community charge, I wish to explore some of the changes which could be and need to be made. Before I do so, I welcome the appointment of my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo) as Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities, and I welcome his comments on his appointment that he is there to listen to other hon. Members and to councils for the various suggestions that they may have on how to improve the workings of the charge.

I do not think that I would be being particularly controversial or disloyal if I were to say that the way in which the community charge has been introduced this year has left something to be desired. Introducing a new charge or tax will always throw up problems—as, for example, some of the anomalies which have arisen over second homes, but some of the more serious problems should have been foreseen.

The Department of the Environment's experience of how local authorities operate, and the experience in Scotland last year, when the community charge was introduced there for the first time, should have alerted us to the likelihood that councils, and Labour councils in particular, would jack up budgets and with them community charge bills in the hope of blaming high bills on the Government who introduced the new system. Indeed, a number of councils, including my local Labour-controlled Kirklees council, went for creative accounting last year by using more of their reserves than was prudent, which inevitably meant that there was less in reserve to keep down community charge bills this year.

If rates were still in existence, this year Kirklees council would have needed to raise them by 35 per cent. to bring in the same amount of money as it is raising through the community charge. The fact that it has set such a high community charge is somewhat immoral; it is certainly highly cynical. It did so because it could then blame the Government for introducing the system, rather than placing the blame where it truly lies—with the council because of its profligacy and inefficiency.

We should have written it into the legislation that no council could increase its budget by more than the rate of inflation in the first year of the changeover to the new system of local government finance. It appears likely that more central Government grant will be provided for local authorities next year. It would make sense for the Government, and it would be acceptable to the public, to legislate so that no council can increase either its budget or its community charge next year by more than the rate of inflation. Obviously, there would be scope for prudent councils to reduce spending, but my proposal would ensure that additional money provided to reduce community charge bills would be used for that purpose.

I feel that the Treasury was unwise to refuse to pick up the cost of the safety net in the first year. Many of the councils that have had to fund that safety net are Conservative. The cost of that led to them having to levy a community charge higher than that warranted by the actual cost of local services. That diminished the accountability element. However, the greatest cause of concern has undoubtedly been the large increases in the amounts payable in community charges this year as against rates last year.

In my constituency where there are thousands of terraced houses with low rateable values, many patriotic Englishmen and women, especially pensioner couples and young married couples, have had their bills increased from between £200 and £250 last year to between £500 and £600 this year. That is a great deal of additional money for such people to find. Many pensioners do not qualify for rebate because they have been prudent during their lives and have savings which, while not providing a great deal of additional income, prohibit them from claiming rebates. That is especially so in Yorkshire, where folk tend to be rather canny and like to save for a rainy day.

I have to report to my hon. Friend the Minister that the transitional relief scheme, intended to soften the blow for such people, has not worked as intended. Whatever else the Government decide to do, they must provide proper, long-term help for them. I hope that my hon. Friend will examine closely the interplay between transitional relief and the safety-net in Kirklees and ensure that decisions related to them help to keep down community charge bills.

I have always supported the principle of the community charge—that is, that everyone should contribute to local government services. It is interesting to note that a recent Gallup poll showed that the majority of the general public also accept that principle. However, there are concerns —and two in particular—about the community charge. The first is that the levels set by local authorities are too high. Secondly, there is a perception that the community charge is not fair because it is a flat rate tax. Of course, the irony is that that wholly ignores the fact that some 25 per cent. of charge payers are in receipt of rebates and that the majority of local government finance comes from central Government, who raise most of their finance through progressive taxes such as income tax.

If community charge levels had been set at between £100 and £200, the public would have accepted its flat rate nature—but because they are so much higher, there is a feeling that the system is unfair. To secure the public acceptance that will ensure that the charge works properly, the Government must either substantially reduce charge levels or make it relate to people's ability to pay—or provide a combination of the two.

I should be happy to see police and fire expenditure taken from local financing, and the community charge reduced accordingly. However, to do that as well as provide extra grant to reduce charge levels across the board would be extremely costly for the Treasury. That is why I believe that it would be sensible to make the charge relate more to people's ability to pay. If the Government do that, they will negate overnight the political flak to which they are being subjected.

Two years ago, I supported the banding of the community charge when I supported the so-called Mates amendment to the Local Government Finance Bill. I still believe that banding would be the most appropriate change to make. It is always easy to argue for a general, uncosted principle, so I shall present a concrete idea. I advocate a three-band system. It would comprise a standard band of community charge payable by individuals having an income above £8,500 and up to the threshold at which the top rate of income tax is payable. I use the figure of £8,500 because it is already a threshold figure used in tax law and in relation to benefits in kind.

The second band would be the standard community charge plus 25 per cent., payable by those paying the top rate of income tax. The third would be the standard charge, less 25 per cent., payable by those having incomes below £8,500. The rebate scheme would still be there to help those at the very bottom of the income scale.

Crucially, local authorities would not need to know the intimate details of people's incomes. Everyone would be liable to the highest rate, with the onus on the individual, in making an application to the local authority, to obtain an Inland Revenue certificate based on his previous year's income to prove eligibility for a lower charge rate.

Mr. Hugo Summerson (Walthamstow): How would a housewife, or some other person who stays at home, be treated under my hon. Friend's system? I refer to the individual who has neither income nor earnings of their own.

Mr. Riddick: My hon. Friend draws attention to one of the anomalies that is frequently raised at my own surgeries. The system that I propose would ensure that non-working mothers looking after their families at home, for example, would pay the lower band of community charge—which would be not only fair but widely welcomed.

The administration of the system I describe would not be too complex for local authorities or the Inland Revenue to undertake—contrary to the argument that might be made by some of my hon. Friends. If such a scheme were to be introduced, the current average community charge throughout England of £363, plus the average rate of inflation—which next year is likely to be in the region of 6 per cent.—could be used as the starting point for the top rate. In that way, no one would pay more in real terms next year than this year. The average top band level, indexed for inflation, would be £385, the middle band £307, and the lower band £231. In my own area of Kirklees, the figures would be £308, £246 and £185 respectively.

With the top band next year similar to this year's community charge, we would not produce the same yield as this year's community charge income of £13 billion. I am indebted to the House of Commons Library for its help with my figures. It estimates that there would be a shortfall of £3·2 billion, based on the figures I have quoted and taking into account the savings that would be made on rebates and transitional relief. The Library suggests that an average middle band of £350 per person could be achieved with an additional Government grant of only £2 million.

All sorts of figures have been bandied about in the press as to how much extra money the Secretary of State for the Environment is trying to get out of the Treasury. Quite a bit of flexibility is built into my system. I ask my hon. Friend to confirm that, contrary to what I have read in certain newspapers, the Government have not ruled out banding, and that the current review will consider my proposals.

A few other problems and anomalies must be sorted out. The Government are committed to introducing legislation to clear up the anomalies relating to caravans. I welcome that commitment. A constituent came to my surgery as recently as last Friday and told me that, having moved house a short while ago, she now has to pay the standard community charge on her previous home, despite the fact that she is trying to sell it—so far without success. That kind of problem must be addressed.

Service men are faced with a real problem. Recently, I have been lucky enough to spend some time with the Army in connection with the armed forces parliamentary scheme, and the problem was put to me on many occasions. Service men have to pay the full community charge, wherever they are based in barracks. Many of them have bought houses to provide them with a home base while leading such a nomadic life. In most cases, they have to pay the standard community charge times two on their homes. A number of bitter complaints have been made to me about that. The Minister must look into the problem, together with his Ministry of Defence colleagues.

I hope that the House and the Minister will accept that I have made constructive suggestions, in marked contrast to the normal style of our debates on the community charge. Opposition Members are interested only in scoring cheap party political points. They never submit alternative proposals. The public would accept the community charge if we made appropriate changes. We could then turn the spotlight on Labour's draconian alternative. Anyone in my constituency who owns his or her own home would pay substantially more under Labour's proposals for a roof tax than they now pay through the community charge. Only last week, I received a parliamentary answer which showed that a man on average earnings in Kirklees would pay well over £1,000 if a local income tax were to be levied.

There is no easy alternative to the community charge. I hope that my hon. Friend, the Cabinet and my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will bear in mind and implement some of my proposals so that the community charge no longer looms large on the political agenda. There are two far more important and fundamental battles that the Prime Minister has to fight: first, to ensure that the regeneration of Britain's enterprise economy and industrial base continues and, secondly, to fight off the Euro-fanatics on the Continent who, in their quest for political union, wish to take power from the British people and Parliament. Let us get the community charge right so that these vital tasks are not blurred.

Mr. Tim Janman (Thurrock) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the hon. Gentleman have the consent of both the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) and of the Minister?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Janman: I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) for giving me 30 seconds or so in which to make one or two comments on what he said.

The most important part of his speech related to the fairness of the community charge and to the ability to pay. As one who voted for the legislation on Second Reading but did not vote for the Mates amendment, I must say that my hon. Friend's basic philosophy—of dealing with this point through the creation of three bands, not based on arbitrary income levels but on those who pay no tax, those who pay at the standard rate, and those who pay at the higher rate—is to be commended. My hon. Friend the Minister should look closely at the practicalities of moving in that direction.

I still believe, as I did on Second Reading, that the community charge is a much fairer system than were the rates, and with a slight touch on the tiller, I believe that we can show the British public that we are prepared to listen to their views on the charge, and to make it fairer. In that context, my hon. Friend's proposals are worthy of further scrutiny in detail. If the Government make the charge fairer, it will be to their great credit.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Christopher Chope): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) for giving us this chance to discuss the community charge, and for the kind remarks that he made about my hon. Friend the Member for Enfield, Southgate (Mr. Portillo). I know that the latter has spent a great deal of time since taking up his post listening to views expressed by our right hon. and hon. Friends and by people outside the House —and taking their views seriously.

I sympathise with my hon. Friend's concern that household bills in Kirklees may in the long run be relatively higher than they were under the system of domestic rates. There is no good reason why they should in future be any higher than community charges elsewhere in the country, however. The aggregate external finance that we give to authorities each year should allow all authorities to levy the same community charge—before the safety net—for a standard level of service.

Historically, rateable values in Kirklees have been low, which, under the old rating system, would have meant that ratepayers in other authorities would have provided extra help through the grant equalisation scheme. The grant equalisation scheme was not universally popular, since it ignored the ability to pay of people in highly rated properties. More than 40 per cent. of homes which had above-average rateable values are occupied by households with below-average incomes.

The effect of the safety net, low rateable value grant and transitional relief is to ease the change in finance systems for authorities such as Kirklees. On the other hand, businesses in Kirklees stand to be significant gainers from the change in local government finance systems and the introduction of the uniform business rate. My hon. Friend did not mention this, but the general rate poundage for Kirklees in 1989-90 was 346·1p, compared with the average for all authorities of 258·3p. With the introduction of the uniform business rate, businesses in Kirklees will be able to look forward to a real reduction of some 25 per cent. in their rate bills.

My hon. Friend said that there would have been a 35 per cent. increase in domestic rates in Kirklees under the old system because of the council's spending policies as applied this year. I whole-heartedly endorse his condemnation of the spending policies of the council. He will know that Kirklees very narrowly missed being included on the charge-capped list of shame. Kirklees benefited considerably from support through the safety net. However, its response was to spend about £117 a head over its standard spending assessment. It escaped capping only by falling within the de minimis provision.

My hon. Friend will recall the meeting which he, my hon. Friend the Member for Batley and Spen (Mrs. Peacock) and a delegation from Kirklees council held in February with my right hon. Friend the then Minister for Local Government and Inner Cities. The meeting discussed in detail the application of the standard spending assessments to Kirklees, and as we have said before, we are prepared to listen to the evidence and arguments for any changes to the methodology of our spending assessments.

There has been substantial comment on either alternative methods of local taxation or variations on the theme of the community charge: indeed, even the Opposition have made a half-hearted attempt. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for the contribution he has made to the debate, and I agree with him and the vast majority of people in this country that the fairest method of raising money to pay for local government is a charge on individuals. That has the double attraction of spreading the burden on paying for local services and increasing accountability—something which has been sadly lacking in the past, but which I am sure in the longer run will greatly influence the local democratic process.

My hon. Friend spoke of the need for the Government to re-examine their policies. Of course, we are looking closely at how the community charge is working in its first year in England and Wales. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has made clear, we are reviewing a wide range of issues, and it is important that, by the time that we make the rate support grant settlement for next year —that is, in a few months' time—we shall have resolved all those matters and announced our conclusions. The basic principle remains the same, however: almost everyone should make some contribution to the cost of local services from which all people benefit.

A system of capital value rates—which the Opposition have courted—would bear many of the less virtuous traits of the old rating system. It would reduce accountability, place a tax on home improvement and relate only poorly to the ability to pay. By no means does it follow that an increase in the capital value of a property is matched by a correlating increase in the income of the individual.

A local income tax would do little better. It would be exorbitantly expensive to administer, and even if a local income taxation system were to be integrated with the existing national taxation system, between 12,000 and 13,000 extra staff would be needed in the Inland Revenue alone. The number of those contributing to the cost of local government would be substantially reduced, and thoe who did have to pay could find themselves paying more than the lion's share. For example, we have calculated—and my hon. Friend has confirmed—that in Kirklees a local income tax bill for a person on a taxable income of £12,000 could have amounted to over £1,000 in 1990-91.

My hon. Friend has spoken about the attractions of banding the community charge. Those who promote the idea of banding will, however, have to address a formidable series of objections. Any scheme that involved basing the level of charge on the income tax status of the individual would be difficult and lengthy to implement. The vast bulk of income tax is collected through PAYE. The Inland Revenue does not have complete or up-to-date records of all taxpayers, as for most people it does not need them—and it hardly needs to be said that it has no records of people who do not pay income tax. My hon. Friend addressed those problems in his speech.

All the models for banding that we have seen so far have suggested a fairly restricted number of bands, generally based on those who do not pay income tax, those who pay at the lower rate and those who pay at the higher rate. That, indeed, is what my hon. Friend has proposed this evening. In the first place, those who pay no income tax will generally be entitled to community charge benefit, which can reduce a person's bill by up to 80 per cent. As my hon. Friend will know, one in four people will receive benefit: some £2·5 billion will be distributed, around £1 billion more than was the case through rate rebates and community charge benefit in Scotland last year. That will mean that, for the least well-off in the community—to whom it matters most—the community charge will be related to the ability to pay.

In the second place, a banding system would have a cruelly punitive effect on those who cross the bands. Those who move from below the income tax level, or from the middle band to the higher band, would at worst risk a net drop in their disposable income—or, at least, a discouragingly high marginal tax rate until they had moved well above the threshold.

Those on high incomes already pay significantly more through income tax. In fact, the top 10 per cent. of households pay about 15 times more than the bottom 10 per cent. towards the cost of local services. If we were to ask all those who are on the higher-rate tax band to pay an additional 50 per cent. of their community charge, that would only raise revenue sufficient to reduce the bills of those on the standard rate tax band by some £10 a year. My hon. Friend recognised the fact that, notwithstanding his banding proposals, there would still be a significant shortfall in income from the community charge, which would have to be made up by the national Exchequer or, in effect, the national taxpayer.

Mr. Riddick: I should like to push my hon. Friend gently and ask him to confirm that the Government have not ruled out the possibility of banding the community charge, and that that is one option being considered under the review. Will he confrm that he will be happy to talk to me? Perhaps I can take him through some of my proposals in more detail.

Mr. Chope: The Government are listening to the points that are made, and I should be happy to discuss my hon. Friend's points in more detail.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: If I may, I should like to continue, as this debate was introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) and the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) did not participate in it.

The measures which we have taken to ease the effects of the transition have been an important factor in respect of the uniform business rate and the community charge. The safety net provides assistance to people in those areas where rates have traditionally been very low. In Kirklees, people have benefited to the tune of £107 per head. Low rateable value grant provides an additional layer of protection, providing an extra £25 per head in Kirkless.

Transitional relief targets assistance on people in low-rated value properties, regardless of whether they are living in an area benefiting from the safety net. Because in Kirklees there is already substantial help through the safety net, the Government's assumed community charge for Kirklees is £220. This means that, where there were two or more charge payers in a household on 31 March, relief will have been awarded where the rates bill was less than about £280. More than 30,000 people in Kirklees will benefit from that relief.

Mr. Wilson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Chope: I shall deal with a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley. He believes that extra protection over and above what has been given so far should be provided for people in low-rated properties. One option would be, of course, to base transitional relief on the actual charge that an authority sets. We have already made it clear, however, that the purpose of transitional relief is not to underwrite spending levels above those that we have assumed. The assumed charge for each authority, which was the basis of the transitional relief scheme, represents broadly what the charge would have been if authorities has sought to raise from their residents an amount consistent with their behaviour in 1989-90 and with the total standard spending figure of £32·8 billion.

The main problem in Kirklees is not that the SSAs have been incorrectly assessed; nor is it that the——

Oral Answers to Questions

DEFENCE

Low Flying

1. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he is taking to reduce the incidence of low-flying military aircraft over populated areas.

3. Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what proposals he has to review the flying of aircraft below 250 ft in the Scottish tactical training area.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Michael Neubert): The operation of the United Kingdom military low-flying system is kept under continuous review as efforts are made to minimise the impact of low-flying training on those on the ground. This monitoring applies equally to the operation of the tactical training areas which provide essential work-up training for exercises in North America.

Mrs. Ewing: Given the broad welcome yesterday for the report by the Select Committee on Defence and especially for the proposal that flights under 250 ft should be phased out over two years, will the Minister tell us when the Government will give a measured response to the recommendations in that report and when they will ensure that hon. Members of all parties who are interested in the subject are given a full opportunity to debate the issues?

Mr. Neubert: We also welcome the fact that the Select Committee has concluded its comprehensive study of this important subject. The report deserves careful and considerable study, which it will receive. In accordance with parliamentary convention, we shall present our formal response in due course. Until then, I cannot respond to any particular recommendation in the report.

Mr. Maclennan: In considering the Select Committee's report, will the Minister pay particular attention to the evidence given by his own officials that it was possible to bring down flight training from 250 ft to 100 ft within two weeks? If the international climate persists, two weeks seems sufficient time in which to make the adjustment. Will the hon. Gentleman also pay particular attention to the fact that this country is paying a far smaller amount for research into simulators, especially on Tornado-type aeroplanes, than the Federal Republic of Germany? It would be appropriate to build up such research while phasing out very low flying.

Mr. Neubert: It is important to remember that very low flying, which occurs in the three tactical training areas, accounts for only 1 per cent. of low-flying training as a whole in the United Kingdom. It would also be as well not to underrate the need for that low-flying training because training in this country is carried out at far greater heights and slower speeds than would be necessary in conditions of war, when aircraft would need to fly lower and faster. I take into account all that the hon. Gentleman has said, but, as I mentioned earlier in response to the hon. Member for Moray (Mrs. Ewing), we shall first have to prepare a formal response to the Select Committee.

Mr. Hague: Will my hon. Friend take particular note of some of the useful and practical recommendations in the Select Committee report, such as better records of low flying in each area and the publicising of a telephone number and address to which members of the public could complain, as well as the other recommendations?

Mr. Neubert: Yes, my hon. Friend is right to recognise the constructive nature of the report and the fact that almost every aspect of low-flying training is covered in it. We shall certainly take account of what is suggested and we shall endeavour to be as positive as possible in reply.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Lincolnshire has the highest concentration of RAF stations in the country and, I believe, one of the highest concentrations of low-flying planes come over my house all the time. Lincolnshire also has a long tradition of great pride in the valour and skill of the RAF. Lincolnshire is totally committed to maintaining the RAF's tactical viability through proper low-flying training——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member should ask a question, please.

Mr. Davies: If the young men in the RAF are prepared to risk their lives in our common defence, the least that we can do is to put up with a little noise occasionally. While naturally investigating any abuses, will my hon. Friend the Minister give very short shrift to the whingers?

Mr. Neubert: Lincolnshire has many claims to fame, as I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister would be the first to acknowledge, and I am glad to hear that it is such a strong source of support for the Royal Air Force and the need to carry out necessary training. As the Select Committee acknowledged, low flying needs intensive training and regular practice. That is the sole purpose of low-flying training in this country.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Does the Minister accept that other countries seem to manage without the amount of low-flying training that we carry out here? Would not it be a sign of the Minister's good faith about the need for change, which my constituents in Porthcawl would welcome, that should there be a reduction not only in low flying by military aircraft but in the number of training aircraft taking off from RAF St. Athan in the Vale of Glamorgan? Will the Minister make that commitment now?

Mr. Neubert: There are no commitments to be made this afternoon, as I made clear earlier. We are members of NATO and we make a major contribution to the defence of this country and that of western Europe. The hon. Gentleman would do well not to belittle the efforts of our highly professional pilots in that defensive system.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that Opposition Members who call for the abandonment of any stand-off capability for our low-flying aircraft expect RAF pilots to deliver old iron bombs with none of the security which comes from flying below radar? That is a recipe for disaster.

Mr. Neubert: My hon. Friend, with his long experience of the Royal Air Force and of defence matters generally, exposes the poverty of the Labour party's defence stance, which will no doubt bring dividends when it is put to the test at another general election in which the issue of defence will be foremost in people's minds when they make their decisions.

Mr. Rogers: Will the Minister inform his hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) that Lincolnshire is not a designated low-flying area and that if any low flying is taking place in his constituency, the pilots are breaking the regulations? The Opposition welcome the Select Committee's recommendations, especially those that we have been urging on the Government for some time, but will the Minister assure the House that he will look urgently at the recommendations relating to ultra-low flying, especially that which affects the three areas in the United Kingdom subjected to flights at 100 ft?

Mr. Neubert: I fear that the Opposition spokesman shares the confusion demonstrated by half the nation's sub-editors in this morning's papers. We must be careful to distinguish between the three tactical training areas where low flying is allowed as low as 100 ft and general low-flying training, which accounts for 99 per cent. of low flying. The latter is spread fairly over the whole country and counties including Lincolnshire will see their share of low flying. The only quibble that I have with my hon. Friend the Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) is that he need not necessarily believe that he is getting an unfair share of that low flying.

Chieftain Tanks

2. Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to make a decision concerning a replacement for the order of Chieftain tanks.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Alan Clark): It remains our intention to reach a decision by the end of this year.

Mr. Batiste: My hon. Friend will be aware from his recent visit to Leeds of the skills, commitment and investment by Vickers and its work force in its objective to produce the best tank in the world for the British Army. Can my hon. Friend the Minister confirm that he has had an opportunity to examine the report on the second milestone and that that excellent company has passed that important test?

Mr. Clark: Yes. I am pleased to announce that Vickers Defence Systems has successfully passed the second milestone report. I am confident that if that progress is maintained, it will pass the third at the end of September. That process should allow completely fair competition, from which we shall select the tank best suited to the Army's requirements.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: In selecting the tank best suited to meet the Army's requirements, does the Minister accept that it is necessary to take account of the threat and the need to meet that threat? Does he agree that it is necessary to resist any attempt to exact a crude percentage decrease in the defence budget and that we should ensure that the defence budget is adequate to meet the United Kingdom's continuing requirements?

Mr. Clark: I very much welcome what the hon. and learned Gentleman has said. That thinking is in the forefront of my right hon. Friend's mind when examining the various options for change in our defence procurement and spending.

Mr. Wilkinson: In the future battlefield of central Europe—[Interruption.]—force levels may be less. Therefore, when reviewing what tank to select to replace the Chieftain, will my hon. Friend examine with the closest care the possibility of ordering dedicated anti-tank helicopters at an early date?

Mr. Clark: I do not go along with my hon. Friend's view that the next battlefield will necessarily be found in central Europe. However, Her Majesty's forces must be prepared to counter Her Majesty's enemies in any theatre. To give them the efficiency and capability that they need, it is necessary to address the correct mix between helicopters and armour.

Mr. Battle: What is the Government's present defence procurement policy? Does the Minister accept that the jobs of those who work in the defence industries, such as those at Barnbow, are proving to be the most precarious in the present climate of disarmament? If that company were not to get the contract, what practical alternatives would the Government suggest to ensure that there is job security for those people in Leeds?

Mr. Clark: To my knowledge, there have been no redundancies so far in either establishment. However, the issue of redundancies and work allocation is entirely a matter for the commercial judgment of the companies concerned.

Mr. Kirkhope: I congratulate my hon. Friend on what he has said about the stage that the replacement tank has reached at Barnbow. Does he agree that we are now in a state of such uncertainty in Europe that we must carefully consider replacing our weapons with the most modern systems that we can find to deal with any eventuality? Does he further agree that the comments of some Labour Members about the future of the Leeds tank factory—that it might be turned over to making dishwashers and washing machines in the future—is typical of the defence policies pursued by the Labour party?

Mr. Clark: Yes. None the less, the Labour party's concept of an arms conversion agency with a central corporate directive ideology remains an interesting concept echoed only in the Soviet Union, which is hardly an example of high economic efficiency.

Rosyth

4. Mr. Douglas: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the nature and purpose of the recent visit of the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Defence Procurement to Rosyth dockyard and naval base.

Mr. Neubert: I paid a routine briefing visit to Rosyth royal dockyard on 25 April as the Minister responsible for the dockyards.

Mr. Douglas: Will the Minister enlighten us about what reassurances he gave to the workers in the dockyard and with Babcock Thorn Ltd. with specific regard to radiation exposure? Will he assure the House that the levels of radiation exposure to which those workers have been subjected in the past will be reduced and that more stringent measures will be adopted in the industry—at Rosyth, Devonport and elsewhere—to ensure that such exposure is reduced and that the workers' health is safeguarded in future?

Mr. Neubert: We naturally take our workers' health and safety extremely seriously. That applies also to the work force in the royal dockyards who are the initial responsibility of the dockyards' contractors. Ministry of Defence policy is that exposure of our employees to radiation should occur only where it is justified, that it should come within the statutory limit of 50 mSv per year and our own much lower self-imposed limit of 30 mSv per year, and that the level should be as low as is reasonably practicable. As a result, the trend for exposure levels has been downwards. If it is any reassurance, 98 per cent. of all dockyard workers have an average exposure of less than 15 mSv and, on average, for all dockyard workers, the exposure is only 2 mSv.

NATO Nuclear Planning Group

5. Mr. Flannery: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what decisions were made at the recent NATO nuclear planning group meeting in Alberta, Canada.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Archie Hamilton): The meeting discussed a wide range of nuclear issues. In particular, nuclear planning group Ministers were able formally to welcome President Bush's recently announced decisions to terminate the follow-on to Lance development and nuclear artillery shell modernisation programmes. A copy of the final communiqués from the NPG has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Flannery: Is not it a fact that tension throughout the world has eased a great deal and at the highest level of the super-powers there is new thinking about nuclear armaments? Will the Minister assure us that we are not the odd man—perhaps I should say the odd woman—out in recognising that fact, but are ready to meet all the other nations who are ready to bring down their nuclear armaments, or are we going to stand out as though the Russians are expected to attack next Thursday afternoon at 3 o'clock?

Mr. Hamilton: Of course, things have changed in the past 12 months. It is a recognition of the fact that the Warsaw pact's capability is much reduced, and the threat from the east European countries is probably no longer there, that it does not seem to be as necessary now as it was to make sure that short-range nuclear systems are modernised. However, I believe that the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation will continue to recognise the need for a flexible nuclear response and to accept the fact that the Soviet Union is still a military super-power with a large nuclear capability and is likely to remain so for the foreseeable future.

Mr. Brazier: I congratulate my hon. Friend on his answer. Does he agree that the Soviet Union not only has more nuclear weapons than the whole of NATO put together but, more importantly, that nuclear weapons are spreading to an increasing number of Third world countries? Does he agree that it is inconceivable that western Europe should shed the only nuclear defences which currently belong in European hands by Britain and France relinquishing their small strategic nuclear deterrents?

Mr. Hamilton: That is quite right. As my hon. Friend has said, our deterrent is a minimum deterrent, so it is not a matter of embarking on a massive arms race. We have the minimum deterrent necessary to give us a nuclear capability. It is a tragedy that the nuclear non-prolification treaty has not been so successful as it might have been and there are other countries developing nuclear capability in addition to the original five powers, including China, which have nuclear weapons.

Mr. O'Neill: In relation to President Bush's welcome statement, will the Minister state whether his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State or the Prime Minister was consulted, or merely informed, before the statement was made?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, there was consultation, and we were kept in touch about the intentions of the United States before the announcement was made.

Mr. David Evans: Does the Minister agree that although there is a lessening of aggression and tension coming from eastern countries, including the Soviet Union, there seems to be an increase in aggression and tension coming from the middle east, particularly Iraq and Libya? Will he therefore assure me and the people of this country that we shall keep up our vigilance and continue to develop our conventional forces and modernise our nuclear deterrent—unlike the Labour party which, at the last Labour party conference, agreed to a reduction in defence spending of £5 billion or, to put it another way, the complete removal of the Royal Air Force? May I ask the Labour party whether £5 billion is the price of protecting our loved ones?

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. It is essential that we keep a defence capability, because we live in an extremely uncertain world. Many of the recent developments that have led to the easing of tension actually create new dangers, so it is important that we should have a nuclear capability as part of our defence capability, and it is essential to keep it up to date.

Ministry Stores (Security)

6. Mr. John Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to increase security at Ministry of Defence stores in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Security at all defence establishments is kept under regular review. We look carefully at any general lessons which can be drawn from incidents such as yesterday's at Eltham.

Mr. Evans: Will the Minister confirm that £3·5 billion worth of military equipment is still stored in depots which do not meet Ministry of Defence fire regulations? Given the previous fires at Donnington which destroyed hundreds of millions of pounds worth of equipment, is not that criminal complacency?

Mr. Hamilton: We have a continuing programme to improve the ability of our stores to withstand fires. It costs considerable sums and cannot be done overnight.

Mr. David Martin: Although I appreciate that the IRA will always use its cowardly methods regardless of the amount of security that we maintain at our bases, and that it will just aim for ever softer targets, will my hon. Friend assure me that as far as possible we shall draw service personnel and activities within secure premises and that when we come to think of selling off MOD establishments which are surplus to requirements we shall bear in mind above all the requirements of security?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, we always bear the need for security in mind when we relocate military establishments. If we ended up with a number of enormous military bases incorporating all our different military establishments, the IRA could claim a victory.

Mr. Molyneaux: Does the Minister agree that there is little point in strengthening the outer defences if potential terrorists can gain access to the very heart of defence installations? Is there not an overwhelming case for a truly effective method of screening all who have access to those establishments?

Mr. Hamilton: I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that there are about 2,000 military establishments in the United Kingdom, and it is extremely difficult to provide a high degree of security at all of them. He would not expect me to go into details of the security measures that we have taken, but it is significant that lives were saved and injuries avoided at Eltham by the precautions that had been taken. The laminated windows that had been put in stopped glass splintering across the room.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: Has my hon. Friend any plans to replace with something rather more effective the current wire mesh fencing that is so commonly used around military establishments and which is so obviously not intruder-proof?

Mr. Hamilton: When my hon. Friend asks for something more effective he is talking about an incredible increase in expenditure on security fencing, if we are to use all the different available sensors and so on that are needed to make them effective. It worries me that people think that security can be enhanced merely by installing perimeter fences, which may create the illusion of security even though it is easy for people to break through them.

Arms Reduction

7. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what United Kingdom forces have been offered for inclusion in the proposed START agreement; and if he will make a statement on the defence implications.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The START negotiations are bilateral between the United States and the Soviet Union —British nuclear forces would therefore not be included in any agreement.

Ms. Primarolo: Why have none of Britain's nuclear forces been included in the START agreement? Is it because the Government are made up of closet warmongers who do not believe in the principle or practice of arms control? Do the Government remember their commitment to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and to negotiate away our nuclear weapons in good faith? Why, when the time is right, are the Government not prepared to make any reductions?

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. Lady is a bit wrong about this. The START treaty was between the United States and the Soviet Union. We were never part of it and it was not intended that we should be. I remind the hon. Lady that the Government's policy is to have the minimum independent nuclear deterrent that we need. We differ from the Opposition, who would like that deterrent negotiated away as soon as possible. I am sure that the hon. Lady supports that stance. There is a major difference in our attitudes. We want Britain to have a minimum nuclear deterrent and I hope that that will remain the position for a long time.

Mr. Mans: Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be foolish to include any British nuclear weapons in the START treaty until the Soviet Union's nuclear arsenal is reduced to the extent that it no longer poses a threat to this country?

Mr. Hamilton: I totally accept what my hon. Friend says. It is difficult to envisage a time when the Soviet nuclear capability would be reduced to that degree. That certainly has to be one criterion. We must also remember earlier contributions to the effect that the non-proliferation treaty has not worked as well as it might and that other countries are now achieving a nuclear capability. We should not be concerned solely about the nuclear capability of the Soviet Union.

Mr. Cohen: Why cannot Trident be included in the START agreement? Is not Trident an eight times increase in capability over Polaris at a time when world tension is reducing? Would not cancellation of the fourth Trident save Britain about £1 billion per annum? Why will not the Government cancel that?

Mr. Hamilton: As I have already explained, Trident is merely an uprating of our nuclear capability, and that is the minimum deterrent that we think we need. It is important for us to maintain Trident because if we did not we would cease to be a nuclear-capable nation. It is not the intention of the Government that we should be in that position, although I know that, in the unlikely event of a Labour Government, the Opposition would negotiate away as early as possible our independent nuclear deterrent.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Following the START treaty, may we look forward to a reduction in nuclear weapons throughout the world? Do the principles of those reductions—that they should be balanced, mutual and verifiable—hold good today and will the Government have nothing to do with the unilateralism about which we still hear from the Opposition?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, indeed, and the basic preliminary agreements of the START treaty are ceilings of 6,000 warheads on 1,600 strategic offensive delivery systems. That would certainly lead to significant reductions. My hon. Friend talks about a reduction in nuclear weapons throughout the world. But other nations are trying to develop nuclear capability and there is a difficulty about making the non-proliferation treaty stronger and have verification in such countries.

Defence Companies

8. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the five largest British defence companies providing defence equipment to the United Kingdom armed forces.

Mr. Alan Clark: The Ministry of Defence does not maintain separate information on the size of companies, but the five largest British companies by turnover and providing equipment to the United Kingdom armed forces in 1989-90 were BP, Shell, ICI, BAT Industries and British Telecom.

Mr. Griffiths: The Minister told the House on 9 January that issues of defence diversity were purely matters for the commercial judgment of the companies concerned. Does not he realise that the Government, private firms and public enterprise must all play a part in the profound changes that are affecting our defence industries? The Government cannot wash their hands and leave the matter purely to commercial considerations.

Mr. Clark: The hon. Gentleman distinguished himself as being the only hon. Member who tried to get a whinge-up going on the occasion of the European fighter aircraft statement by my right hon. Friend last week. Therefore, I do not feel particularly disposed to join him in a philosophical discourse.

Sir Jim Spicer: Does my hon. Friend agree that the question just put to him was absolute nonsense? Would not it be much better to talk about which companies are most important to our defence capability and, in that context, would he include Westland?

Mr. Clark: Plainly, as our principal helicopter manufacturer, Westland will have an important role in the provison of helicopters for the armed forces in the next decade.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will the Minister advise the five companies to which he referred to avoid getting into bed with SGL Defence Ltd., whose paid hack in the House of Commons is the Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that he cannot say that. We dealt with the matter yesterday. The hon. Gentleman must not cast aspersions of that kind across the Chamber. Will he please withdraw that charge?

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am not aware of what I can withdraw. The Register of Members' Interests shows that the hon. Gentleman is a paid hack of SGL Defence Ltd.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The phrase to which I object is "paid hack". That is not a parliamentary expression. [Interruption.] Order. This takes up a lot of time. Will the hon. Gentleman please withdraw the phrase "paid hack"? It is unparliamentary.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Would paid servant be in order, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that he must not bandy words of that kind. I want him to withdraw that charge. If it was levelled against an Opposition Member, he would feel strongly about it. Withdraw it, please.

Mr. Allen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am dealing with the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

Mr. Allen: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I am not dealing with another point while I am on my feet. I am asking the hon. Member for Workington to withdraw that phrase.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am a little concerned that my credibility among my hon. Friends might drop if I withdraw it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman should be far more concerned that his credibility in this place may be compromised. Withdraw the charge, please.

Mr. Campbell-Savours rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman does not need to consult his hon. Friends.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I withdraw it.

Mr. Clark: One thing that I have never done is to tell anyone whom he should go to bed with.

Infantry

9. Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many infantry battalions, both Regular and Territorial Army, are in existence at present; and if he will estimate the number of infantry battalions in 1995.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: At present, there are 55 Regular and 41 Territorial Army infantry battalions in the British Army. The total number of battalions in 1995 will depend on the circumstances at the time. However, we recognise that the changing circumstances in Europe will have implications for the deployment and structure of our forces and we are therefore examining options for change.

Mr. Speller: Does my hon. Friend agree that, as the next five years will show, the defence of the realm in the near future is more likely to depend on soldiers on the ground than on the intercontinental ballistic missile? Will he undertake to preserve the county infantry regiment with its territorial battalion as the logical military bobby on the beat which we are likely to need in the face of increased urban terrorism?

Mr. Hamilton: I accept my hon. Friend's view that we shall continue to need the capability to meet the terrorist threat in Northern Ireland, and that that capability will continue. However, we are now moving into a period when arms control agreements are likely to be signed and I cannot anticipate what the effects of those will be on the size and shape of the British Army.

Mr. Dalyell: If a major in an infantry battalion were to get into any kind of dismissal or resignation difficulty, would his case be confined, like paragraph 19A of the report on Colin Wallace's case in relation to his statement, to a very few senior officials? Would that be the position?

Mr. Hamilton: I cannot comment on what parallels can be drawn between the question and Colin Wallace.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: When my hon. Friend is considering the future and number of infantry battalions, will he consider all the ways in which he can enhance the strength and quality of the volunteer reserves and Territorial Army? Will he continue to emphasise the importance of links between infantry battalions and their local area, county, and so on?

Mr. Hamilton: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We are well aware of the importance of links between infantry battalions and various parts of the country. If there are changes, there is no doubt in my mind that the role of the Territorial Army and the volunteer reserves will become more important—in terms of reinforcement plans in Germany, for example.

Lance Missile

10. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether Her Majesty's Government will abandon their support for a replacement to the Lance short-range nuclear missile.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The Government were consulted on the decision not to proceed with the development of a follow-on to Lance, and we fully support it.

Mr. Patchett: How do the Government justify their isolation in that respect? Will they stop blocking proposed cuts in short-range nuclear weapons at the next meeting of NATO?

Mr. Hamilton: We are not blocking any SNF negotiations, because the alliance's position on that has not yet been agreed. But there is no question of our blocking it. As to going along with the decision not to have a follow-on to Lance, we must accept that over the past year the position in eastern Europe has radically changed and that the need for short-range nuclear systems is not what it was.

Mr. Wilkinson: In these important considerations, will my hon. Friend bear it in mind that the alliance needs to maintain the capability rather than a particular category of weapons systems?

Mr. Hamilton: That is absolutely right. I am sure that my hon. Friend agrees that we need to maintain the flexibility of nuclear response. Therefore, I sincerely hope that a tactical air-to-surface missile will be introduced as part of that—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to settle down, please.

Mr. O'Neill: In view of the Minister's commitment to a mix of short-range nuclear weapons, will he say where they will be deployed and against whom, given the shortness of their range in Europe?

Mr. Hamilton: It is obvious that the hon. Gentleman is addressing his question to the wrong person. Why does the Soviet Union have both a shorter-range and ballistic missile capability? As long as it has that capability, and the ability to administer nuclear weapons at different ranges, we must be able to respond and thus maintain the nuclear stalemate in Europe.

Mr. Dickens: Does my hon. Friend agree that what distinguishes the Conservative party from all other parties is that we are not prepared to drop our guard in defence matters? It is very important to be able to counter-punch when necessary. Mr. Gorbachev may not always be there, and we must keep up our defences.

Mr. Hamilton: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We are entering a period of great uncertainty, and it would be foolish during that time to drop our guard.

Merchant Ships

11. Mr. Buckley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to use only British merchant ships for Ministry of Defence charter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neubert: It is the Government's policy to charter vessels on the basis of availability, suitability and cost—and, subject to those conditions, to give preference to British ship operators.

Mr. Buckley: Is the Minister aware that British-owned and registered merchant shipping has slumped from 1,143 vessels to 336, and that that is the lowest figure this century? Is the hon. Gentleman prepared, as a Defence Minister, to sustain the British merchant fleet by accepting the recommendation that it should be the only fleet to which the Ministry of Defence gives charter work?

Mr. Neubert: There has been a decline in the size of the British merchant fleet, but that decline has been slowing down and profitability has picked up in the past few years. Most forecasters see some scope for expansion in merchant shipping worldwide. In the meantime, the Ministry of Defence—we are obviously responsible for that aspect—is chartering vessels from the merchant fleet. In 1988-89 out of 60 that were chartered, 45 were British —75 per cent.—and in the 15 months from 1 January last year until the end of March this year, of the 40 vessels chartered 32 were British. Of the eight that were not British, five of the ships were not available on the British register.

Mr. Leigh: What are the defence implications of the present shrinkage?

Mr. Neubert: If the decline were to continue and to gather speed, there would be grounds for concern. At present, we have no reason to believe that, with the different arrangements that we have made, the armed forces would not have their shipping needs met in time of war.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Worthington: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further meetings later today. This evening I shall attend a memorial service for the late Lord Rothschild.

Mr. Worthington: 1990 started in January—

Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. This takes up a lot of time.

Mr. Worthington: 1990—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is to the detriment of hon. Members whom I shall not be able to call.

Mr. Worthington: This is now May—

Hon. Members: Hurrah!

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members know that this takes a lot of time from others who wish to be called.

Mr. Worthington: Why is it therefore that the Department of Employment has not yet issued application forms to voluntary organisations for European social fund money that was available from January? Why is it that 11,000 training places and £25 million are put at stake in that way? Why is it that organisations such as the Scottish Association for Mental Health and the organisation for the disabled in Glasgow, Goodwill, have their existence endangered by the Government's failure to use European social fund money? Why is it—[Interruption.].

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a very long question.

Mr. Worthington: Why is it that every training scheme in this country is endangered by the incompetence and inefficiency of the Department of Employment?

The Prime Minister: It would seem from what the hon. Gentleman said at the beginning of his question that there is still time for forms to be issued and for applications to be made for those forms. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the people who attempted to defeat training schemes in this country were the trade unions which fought the youth training scheme and the employment training schemes.

Q2. Sir William Clark: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Sir William Clark: Will my right hon. Friend today compare the actions of Hillingdon council and Merton council? Is she aware that in Hillingdon, which has just become Conservative controlled, the community charge is being reduced by £70 this year, whereas Merton, which has just become Labour-controlled, has promised to double the charge next year? Does my right hon. Friend agree that in Labour-controlled councils in London the average community charge is £445, whereas for Conservative-controlled councils the figure is £294? Therefore, living in a Labour-controlled council area means an extra bill of about £3 a week.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. Hillingdon has increased the amount spent on education, the elderly and the handicapped. That proves that Conservative councils cost less and give much better service than do Labour councils.

Mr. Kinnock: Does the Prime Minister acknowledge that last week's higher inflation figures were largely the result of higher interest and mortgage rates, higher rents and the poll tax? Will she confirm that that is the direct result of her policies? Does she therefore accept that she is not just the Prime Minister of inflation but the prime causer of inflation?

The Prime Minister: I remind the right hon. Gentleman that local councils set the community charge. If local councils had not overspent to the tune of £3 billion, the retail prices index would be 1 per cent. lower. The biggest overspenders were Labour, so the right hon. Gentleman bears some of the blame.

Mr. Kinnock: Is not that typical? The major components of the rise in inflation have been identified as the consequence of Government policies, yet the right hon. Lady is trying to blame everyone else. It is a wonder that she did not get the right hon. Members for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) and for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath) and everybody else into that excuse. If the Prime Minister is trying, as she says, to squeeze out inflation, why does she spend so much time cramming inflation in, with higher interest rates, higher mortgage rates, higher rents and the poll tax?

The Prime Minister: And why was it Labour's policy to persuade Labour councils to set the community charge as high as they could get away with? Yes, the retail prices index would be very much lower but for the community charge. It would also have been lower if the community charge had had the rebates taken off it and if housing rent rebates had also been deducted from it, as they were in Labour's time.

Mr. Mates: Will my right hon. Friend take this opportunity to congratulate the leaders of Fine Gael and the Progressive Democrats in the Republic of Ireland on their robust condemnation of their country's extradition laws? When she next meets the Irish Prime Minister, will she convey to him the utter disgust of most citizens of this country—Great Britain and Northern Ireland—at the fact that those who are wanted to answer charges for terrorist offences continue to be set free in the Irish Republic because the judges say that their offences are political?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend. Extradition is a very important part of upholding the rule of law and ensuring that people are brought before the courts so that they can properly hear the case and pronounce them innocent or guilty.

Q3. Ms. Short: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Ms. Short: Why have the Government done nothing about paedophiles who are posing as social workers and seeking to molest children throughout the country—for example, by issuing passes to genuine social workers and health visitors? Recently I visited the vice squad at New Scotland Yard. The unit that deals with child pornography and other illegal pornography is so overworked that it is unable to follow up leads that would take it to people who are sexually abusing children. Will the Prime Minister take action to strengthen that unit?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept what the hon. Lady says. She knows full well that every hon. Member is doing his or her level best to stop child abuse and to prevent people from molesting children or women. The police are deeply concerned. Many social services departments are also doing their level best to deal with the problem. I suggest that the Opposition are playing at cheap party politics.

Q4. Mr. Yeo: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Yeo: Without pre-empting the conclusions of the welcome review of the community charge that is being carried out, can my right hon. Friend assure the House that the Government are not contemplating the introduction of either a roof tax or a local income tax into any part of the United Kingdom? Can she further assure the House that—as reported in the newspapers—such matters will be considered by Ministers for longer that the two minutes that it apparently took for the roof tax to be endorsed by Labour Members?

The Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that the Government believe that we should not introduce either a roof tax or a local income tax. It would be the worst of all worlds to have a tax on capital values augmented by a tax on income. It would be a high tax for all citizens. We are considering modifications to the present community charge, and we shall be in a position to announce them in a few weeks. They would not include the problem of the structure of local authorities, which is for longer-term consideration.

Mr. Ashdown: Does the Prime Minister agree with her Chancellor's forecast of two months ago that interest rates will be "materially lower" by the end of the year, or with the statement of the Chief Secretary to the Treasury two days ago that in the present dire economic circumstances any such forecast would be foolish? Which statement is right, and which is wrong?

The Prime Minister: I do not think that the statements are as opposite as the right hon. Gentleman suggests. I agree with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and I also agree with my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, whose message, which was never understood or acted upon by Opposition Members on either the Front or the Back Benches, was that we must always keep public spending firmly under control. That is the essence of sound policy.

Q5. Mr. Janman: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Janman: Is my right hon. Friend aware of a document, publicised today, that rules out statutory incomes policy and abandons the goal of full employment? Given the publicly stated support for low interest rates and high public spending by leading members of the Labour party, is my right hon. Friend surprised to learn that that document was prepared for the home policy committee of the Labour party?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the Prime Minister can have any responsibility for Labour party policy.

Q6. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: May we take it from the answers given to my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition that the one person who is not to blame for the high interest and inflation rates is the same person who has headed this wretched Administration for the past 11 years? Are we to take it that when those policies were decided upon she was simply absent, as she was when the leak occurred over Westland?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman can take it from my replies that I am glad that it was not I who was responsible for the 26·9 per cent. inflation rate under Labour: it was Harold Wilson and the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey).

Q9. Mr. Favell: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Favell: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) referred to the problem of people posing as social workers. It is becoming an increasing crime problem, with bogus gas and electricity men preying on pensioners and others. The problem is that identification can be bogus, too. Is not it time for another look at the possibility of a national identity card scheme?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has presented his own solution, but I think that he will agree that it is up to everyone to do all that they can to support the police in their inquiries, and to be on their guard to watch for people who may come round. They must check with their local social services departments at once if they have any suspicion. That is the only way to protect the children and the family.

Q11. Mr. Leighton: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 15 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Leighton: Now that there is only one member of her original Cabinet left—the rather forlorn and semi-detached deputy Prime Minister—why does not the Prime Minister consider sacking him as well, and then she could shout "Bingo!" And if she were to take the message of the current public opinion polls and go, we could shout "Bingo!"

The Prime Minister: We do not take quite such a light-hearted view of politics. We believe in having the best Cabinet, and that is what I have.

Nuclear Dumping (Dounreay)

3.30 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the decision today by the Secretary of State for Scotland to allow test boring for nuclear dumping at Dounreay."

This disgraceful decision—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will hon. Members who are not staying for this Standing Order No. 20 application please leave quietly?

Mr. Salmond: This disgraceful decision is made all the more offensive by the fact that, yet again, important announcements concerning Scotland have not been made to the House of Commons, and yet again the Secretary of State is hiding from Opposition Members. We need a debate to force the Government to defend their decision before Scotland's elected representatives. The real importance of the matter lies in the fact that, once again, the Secretary of State for Scotland has shown his contempt for the clearly expressed wishes of the Scottish people.

In granting planning permission to Nirex, the Government are overriding not only the decision of the elected representatives of Highland region but also the overwhelming vote against Nirex by the people of Caithness in the referendum last November. At that time, despite the attempt to buy votes with the deep pockets of Nirex and the claims that Caithness would be a soft touch for dumping, the people said no to Nirex by a majority of 3:1.

At that time, even Nirex claimed that the views of the people would be taken into account along with other factors when the Secretary of State reached his decision. In fact, today, neither in the brief statement from the Scottish Office nor in the letter to the Nirex lawyers, is there any mention of the views of the people of Caithness. They have been dismissed as irrelevant to the consideration of the planning commission. Given that the only reason Nirex is investigating Caithness is that it claimed public support for its plans, this is a display of breath-taking hypocrisy.

The Secretary of State may claim the fiction that test drilling for nuclear dumping is a separate matter from dumping itself, but nobody in Scotland is likely to be fooled. The Government and Nirex are lining Scotland up to be Europe's No. 1 dumping ground for nuclear waste. As "Spitting Image" once noted, the Tory party seems to envisage an energy exchange between Scotland and England: we give England our oil and gas and England gives us its nuclear waste.

It has not escaped our attention that the Secretary of State for Energy was unwilling to allow the dumping of low-level waste in his constituency. But the Secretary of State for Scotland seems prepared to allow major waste dumping in Scotland.

The Secretary of State may wish to run away from the wrath of Scottish Members, but his party will not be able to avoid the political consequences of his decision today. The campaigns that will be launched against the proposals in Scotland, by the SNP and by Scotland Against Nuclear Dumping, will equal in strength—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I take it that the hon. Member has finished? I was about to say that, in view of the fact that I had to interrupt him, I will let him have another half minute.

Mr. Salmond: We need a debate so that the arguments deployed by local councils and local people cannot be ignored by the Secretary of State for Scotland. We know the real dangers and problems associated with the deep-level storage of nuclear waste, the inevitable risk in the transportation of that material through Scotland and the potential damage to the core industries of the north of Scotland—fishing, farming and tourism—if the public perception of our clean environment is tarnished.

We need the Secretary of State for Scotland to explain his decisions to the Scottish people, and we should like him to do that from the Treasury Bench.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) seeks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the granting of permission for test bore hole drilling at Dounreay."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Member has said, but, as he knows, I have to decide only whether to give it precedence over the business set down for today or for tomorrow. I regret that the matter he has raised does not meet the requirements of the Standing Order, and I therefore cannot submit his application to the House.

Points of Order

3.35 pm

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Dr. David Clark.

Mr. Douglas: Why? I was before him.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have called the hon. Member on the Front Bench.

Mr. Douglas: What about looking after minorities?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is very out of character for the hon. Gentleman, who is a long-standing Member of the House. Dr. David Clark.

Dr. Clark: The House knows, Mr. Speaker, that you have repeatedly deprecated the fact that certain Ministers have made major announcements on matters of policy outside the confines of the House, thus allowing hon. Members no opportunity to cross-examine them. Have you noticed that there is a question on the Order Paper from the hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague) which was not there yesterday—in other words, it is a planted question—and that this morning the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and No. 10 Downing street have been briefing the press about that question, which asks whether the Minister "has any plans to add to his previous statement on bovine spongiform encephalopathy in the light of recent events."

In view of the considerable concern outside the House, which has been exacerbated by the announcement in the last half hour that Tory-controlled Westminster city council has banned the use of British beef in school meals, I wonder whether you have received any application from the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to make a statement in the House, and if not, whether you would use your good offices to prevail upon the Minister to come to the House at 7 o'clock to tell us his latest plans to tackle the problem.

Mr. Speaker: I see that there is a question on the Order Paper in the name of the hon. Member for Richmond, Yorks (Mr. Hague), but that is not a statement made outside the House; it is part of our parliamentary proceedings. I have not received any requests for a statement, but I remind the hon. Gentleman that there is a prime opportunity to put questions to the Minister on Thursday in Agriculture questions.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I draw your attention to columns 692 and 693 of yesterday's Official Report? Can you confirm that the contents in these columns were relevant to the comments by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), and can you tell the House whether an apology has been received for the discourteous and appalling comments about the Chair last night?

Mr. Speaker: I of course study Hansard every morning when I have not been in the Chair, and I have not received any such request.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I will take Mr. Dick Douglas [Interruption.] Order. I call the hon. Gentleman to speak from where he was when I called him. It is a convention of the House.

Mr. Douglas: This is a convention. I have appointed myself the leader of my party.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall call the hon. Member when he goes back to his seat.

Mr. Douglas: In deference to you, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. Speaker: No more bandying words with me, please. When the hon. Gentleman goes back to his seat, I will call him.

Mr. Douglas: With great deference to you, Mr. Speaker, occupation of the Front Bench is a convention. I notice that the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), who is about to replace me as a member of the Select Committee on Defence, is still sitting on the Front Bench.

My point of order is about the Select Committee on Defence. You will have noticed, Mr. Speaker, that, after many years as a member of the Select Committee on Defence, I am to be replaced by a member of the official Opposition. I make no quarrel——

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): He has gone into retreat.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Douglas: I am not going to be deflected from the point I wish to make. I recognise the rules, the obligations and the establishment in the House, but the establishment on both sides protects itself.

The Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence, for whom I had great respect in the past, has an interest in defence-related organisations. I have taken the view—the Chairman of the Select Committee on Procedure has written to me that it is a personal view, so I accept the onus of the fact that it is a personal view—that anyone appearing before a Select Committee of the House should have the understanding in his or her mind that the evidence that he or she gives should be used for the purpose of that Select Committee and for no other purpose.

That may be a personal view, but I innocently—perhaps naively—thought that the House would uphold that principle. I understand that the House, the Select Committee on Procedure and the Select Committee on Members' Interests do not necessarily take that view. The Chairman of the Select Committee——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the point of order?

Mr. Douglas: I am coming to the point of order. It is that no Chairman of a Select Committee of the House should hold interests which place that principle in jeopardy. I take the view that the interest of the Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence in defence-related companies places that principle in jeopardy. If that is not an issue for the House, I do not know what is.

Mr. Speaker: It is not a matter for me. [HON. MEMBERS: "Why?"] Well, the hon. Gentleman knows the route he should follow. He should make his strongly held views known to the Chairman of the Select Committee concerned. As to the first point that the hon. Member raised, I know that for many years he has been a valuable member of the Select Committee on Defence. It is not a matter for me that he has been taken off, although I may have my own regret about it.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Further to the point raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) on column 692, Mr. Speaker. I was here during the debate. I have told the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing) that I intended to raise the matter this afternoon. If standards are to mean anything in the House, when your deputy is in the Chair, he must be afforded courtesy and protection. The hon. Member for Falkirk, East has every opportunity to apologise now. If he refuses, will you please order him to do so, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: If representations had been brought to me by the First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means, who is a stalwart character and, I think, well able to look after his own interests, I would certainly have done that. But no such representation has been made to me.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Further to the point of order. First, may I say that I am grateful to the hon. Member for Langbaurgh (Mr. Holt) for raising the point of order; he spoke to me earlier on the Terrace of the House. One of my great weaknesses in life is attractive company. I was so distracted by the absolutely beautiful and attractive company that he was keeping on the Terrace that I missed completely what he was saying to me. I am very grateful to him now that he has raised it as a point of order. That is more than I can say for the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), who did not have sufficient decency or courtesy—or the good fortune to be sharing that attractive company. He did not, therefore, bother to tell me. I have know the hon. Gentleman since his pre-House of Commons days, so nothing about him surprises me.

If I felt for one minute that I was wrong in what I said last night—[HON. MEMBERS: "You were."] I have no cause to apologise. I have a great advantage over you, Mr. Speaker, today of all days. I was here last night when the exchanges took place and you were not. I am perfectly satisfied that my attitude last night reflected my anger and the fact that I felt I had been wrongly treated, that the House had been wrongly treated and that the debate had been mishandled by the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: I will not comment on that. I have had a report from the Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means on the matter. As to the hon. Gentleman's—[Interruption.] Will he listen to me, please? On his first point, I hope that he will spend more time in the Chamber, where he will find plenty of attractive company.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Further to the point of order of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas), Mr. Speaker. On 3 May, the hon. Member for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Defence, wrote a courteous letter to me asking for an apology in relation to a question of mine —he said "allegation", but I think that it was in question form—and he sent you a copy of the letter.

Before we take any further action—and we feel that proceedings should be kept on the Floor of the House—some of us would like to know a great deal more about the issue. Is it not highly desirable that there should be time for a debate and for some kind of explanation? Will you use your influence with the Leader of the House to try to get the matter cleared up one way or another? It is not a matter for slogans or points of order; it is a deep issue of principle and should be resolved in a civilised way.

Mr. Speaker: I do not in any way disagree with what the hon. Gentleman has said. As he well knows, the Select Committee on Members' Interests is looking at this matter——

Mr. Douglas: It is not.

Mr. Speaker: —and I hope that we shall shortly receive a report about it.

Mr. Madden: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. At 7 pm yesterday, I sought on a point of order of which I gave notice to raise the case of 33 young Chinese, including a girl who is eight months pregnant, who have sought political asylum in Britain and who are now threatened by the Home Office with deportation to Panama where, undoubtedly they would be returned to mainland China with all the risks that that would involve. I am surprised that the Home Office and the Home Secretary did not seek to make a statement about the matter today. It is unprecedented for the Home Office to seek to deport without allowing an application for a judicial review of the refusal to be heard in the courts.

Nevertheless, I ask you now, Mr. Speaker, for advice. Would it be possible for us to raise the matter with the Home Office Minister who will speak on immigration changes tonight—at a late hour, I fear—in such a way that time is not deducted from the hour and a half which has been allocated for the debate on changes to rules and procedures? If that was possible, it would be welcome to all hon. Members who are concerned about the important implications of this extraordinary behaviour and decision by the Home Office.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On the same point——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Allow me to deal with the matter so that we can move on to the next business.

I can tell the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) that it would not be within the scope of the debate on immigration rules to raise that matter. The debate deals with the imposition of visa requirements on citizens of Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia, except for those who are qualified as residents of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Further to the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). While he and you, Mr. Speaker, were absolutely right in that the wider issue of Members' interests in general is a legitimate subject for debate—[HON. MEMBERS: "Thank you."]—I have never denied it —the subject of the allegation made by the hon. Member for Linlithgow was specific and wild. Had there been the remotest scintilla of truth in it, it would have been shameful if I had been behaving in the way that the hon.

Gentleman alleges. He asked for an answer. He has had an unequivocal answer from my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence stating that the hon. Gentleman's allegations are totally without foundation. It was on that narrow point that I consulted you, Mr. Speaker, and I have written to the hon. Member for Linlithgow asking him to withdraw his wild allegation, which received much currency, and also to apologise for the implications behind his allegation.

Mr. Dalyell: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. This is part of the trouble. It was not an unequivocal answer. It was the kind of answer that was about as unequivocal—if I can put it this way—as the answers that I have received on Colin Wallace. It was that kind of Ministry of Defence answer from the Secretary of State which, if one looked at it very carefully, was very ambiguous. That is part of the trouble and why we need a debate.

Mr. Speaker: That is just the point. I think that we should best leave the matter to the Select Committee.

Mr. Douglas rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet.

Mr. Douglas: I understand that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We should best leave the matter to the Select Committee on Members' Interests, which is looking into that very matter. I call Mr. Winnick.

Mr. Winnick: I wonder whether I can remind you, Mr. Speaker, that last June unanimous concern was expressed in the House—there was no dissent—about the crushing of the pro-democracy movement in China. We paid tribute to the people who were fighting in a terrorist dictatorship for the principles in which we believe. [HON. MEMBERS: "What is the point of order?"] My point of order is simply this: following the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden), there is undoubtedly much concern that the people to whom my hon. Friend referred may well be genuine political refugees. There is a question whether they would be subject, if they were here, to judicial review. That has been denied them at the moment, and there is a great possibility that they simply will not be in the United Kingdom when the time comes. Is there not an inconsistency in that, last June, we paid tribute to the courage of those people in China while a year later in Britain we are denying some of those people the right to political asylum?

Mr. Speaker: That may well be. However, the hon. Gentleman will have to take up that matter with the Minister concerned. As I understand it, those people arrived here on Canadian visas.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Further to the point of order raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and by the hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Ewing), surely the situation cannot be allowed to stand. Yesterday evening, the hon. Member for Falkirk, East said, among other things:

> "You seem to make up the rules as you go along, Mr. Deputy Speaker".—[Official Report, 14 May 1990; Vol. 172, c. 692.]

The hon. Gentleman has refused to apologise for that attack on the Chair, which was made without a thread of justification. One fully accepts that he may have been in an excitable frame of mind last night, but he looked perfectly normal this afternoon. Surely the hon. Gentleman must apologise for a completely unjustified attack on the Chair.

Mr. Douglas rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

I say again that I discussed the matter with the First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means this morning. He did not feel that there had been any slur or attack on him. [Interruption.] That is what he told me. His view was that he had dealt with the matter in an adequate and proper fashion, and I am sure that he did.

Mr. Douglas: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether it will be helpful.

Mr. Harry Ewing rose——

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. Member now going to say something helpful?

Mr. Ewing: I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am grateful that you have put it on the record that the First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means, unlike irresponsible Conservative Members, did not think that there was anything untoward about the exchange last night. I am grateful also to the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), who described me as being excited last night, but perfectly ordinary this afternoon. That is more than I can say for him. He was incompetent last night and even more incompetent this afternoon.

Mr. Douglas: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No. I remind the House that we have a very long day ahead of us, including the debate on the immigration rules. I propose to hear the ten-minute Bill —the Control of Toxic Waste Residues Bill. I call Mr. Frank Cook.

Control of Toxic Waste Residues

3.54 pm

Mr. Frank Cook (Stockton, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to protect the environment by controlling the manufacture and by regulating the disposal of toxic chemical waste residues; and for connected purposes.

I am as aware as most hon. Members that the times when ten-minute Bills have made it to the statute book are about as rare as rocking horse droppings.

My proposals can be described as two-pronged. First, I am seeking to achieve the agreement of the Secretary of State for the Environment that he should set a timetable within which chemical manufacturers should design new chemical plants with toxic neutralising units of an appropriate character and capacity at the end of each production chain. Secondly, I am asking the Secretary of State to require chemical manufacturers to fit such units on existing plants, where practical.

That twofold approach would deal with the existing problem of the stockpiles of toxic residues and go some way towards resolving the problem of the production of further toxic waste later. The irony of the dilemma with which society is faced is that, if we had neutralising units within the processed chain, which would render the residue non-toxic before it became a residue, no-one would be worried about it, whether the neutralising unit was some form of incineration unit or simply a chemical process. The problem arises when we allow a residue to become toxic and then refer to it as a toxic residue. When attention is drawn to that, people's anxieties are raised. That is why it is necessary to design new plants in such a way as I have described. That is possible, and should be encouraged. The Treasury should give some incentive for units to be retrofitted to existing plants if they are young enough.

The Bill also seeks to contain toxic wastes within the region in which they are generated. That means that each region that derives an economic benefit from the creation of the chemicals that are produced in making the waste would be saddled with the responsibility of disposing of the waste thus created. It also means that we could dispense with the necessity of transporting toxic waste from one region to another.

A further advantage of adopting that course of action would be that toxic wastes—the residues that give rise to the anxiety—would be dealt with by communities that know the character and behaviour of the chemical compounds that are causing worry. Those communities know best how to draw up a disposal specification and how to ensure that that specification is adhered to stringently and responsibly.

It may not be necessary to deal with such toxic waste residues by incineration, but because many of the toxic residues come into existence through some form of heat application in a technical chemical process, many can also be disposed of by the application of heat. Incineration is a proven, safe and effective system for some chemicals, when carried out at appropriate temperatures under adequate pressure, in suitable plants, by qualified staff, using correct procedures, under proper supervision, applying constant monitoring in complete accordance with the predetermined approved specification to which I have referred.

I realise that this is an altruistic proposal and that it is pie in the sky, but I offer the Bill to the House as a means of discussing an issue that is causing great disquiet throughout the country and beyond our national borders. I offer it as a means of aiming at something better than what we already have, which is precious little.

For a start, we do not even know the size and character of the problem. I give credit to the Government, because I know they are conducting a survey. However, I do not think that it will go far enough. The audit should be more far-reaching and more specific about the nature of the chemicals and how they are dismantled. The adoption of my proposals would go some way towards meeting the requirements of society today, and I commend them to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Frank Cook, Ms. Marjorie Mowlam, Mr. Ted Leadbitter, Ms. Joyce Quin, Mr. John Cummings, Ms. Hilary Armstrong, Mr. Don Dixon, Ms. Joan Ruddock, Mr. Tony Lloyd, Ms. Joan Walley, Mr. David Winnick and Mr. Gerald Bermingham.

CONTROL OF TOXIC WASTE RESIDUES

Mr. Frank Cook accordingly presented a Bill to protect the environment by controlling the manufacture and by regulating the disposal of toxic chemical waste residues; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 6 July and to be printed. [Bill 140.]

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

(Clauses 3, 9, 10, 20, 23, 25 and 68)
Considered in Committee
[MR. HAROLD WALKER in the Chair]

Ordered,

That the order in which proceedings in Committee of the whole House on the Finance Bill are to be taken shall be Clause 68, Clause 9, Clause 10, Clause 3, Clause 20, Clause 23 and Clause 25—[Mr. Lilley.]

Clause 68

CONTRIBUTIONS TO TRAINING AND ENTERPRISE COUNCILS

4.2 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley); I beg to move amendment No. 34, in Clause 68, page 55, line 34, after 'council', insert 'or a local enterprise company'.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments; No. 35, in Clause 68, line 49, after 'council', insert 'or company'.

No. 36, in Clause 68, page 56, line 17, at end insert
(b) "local enterprise company" means a company with which an agreement (not being one which has terminated) under which it is agreed that the company shall carry out the functions of a local enterprise company has been made by the Scottish Development Agency, the Highlands and Islands Development Board, Scottish Enterprise or Highlands and Islands Enterprise.'.

Mr. Lilley: In line with the statement on Budget day, we announced last week that the new tax relief proposed in the clause for business contributions to training and enterprise councils in England and Wales will also be available for contributions to local enterprise companies in Scotland. The amendments simply achieve that result. They provide that the relief for contributions to LECs will be on the same basis and for the same period as that for TECs. I hope that they will be welcomed by all hon. Members. As TECs and LECs will have many similar functions, it is clearly right that the same tax relief should be available to both.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): I apologise for the intrusion into the Minister's brief opening remarks, but will he reassure me that tax relief granted in respect of investments in training and welfare will extend beyond what is considered to be the normal business sector, for example into professions and other such spheres, so that the broadest possible tax relief is given to training and investment in those sectors?

Mr. Lilley: I reassure the hon. Gentleman that there is no discrimination between different sectors of industry. As long as the contribution meets the conditions of the clause, whether it is in England, Wales or Scotland, it will attract relief.

Amendment agreed to.

Mrs. Margaret Beckett (Derby, South): I beg to move amendment No. 21, in page 55, line 45, leave out 'if' and insert 'to the extent that'.

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 19, in line 47, leave out 'of any kind whatsoever' and insert
'in money or money's worth.'.

No. 20, in line 49, at end insert
'provided that neither this subsection nor subsection (4)(b) below shall apply where the benefit in question comprises the training of employees of the person making the contribution and that training is wholly or mainly for the purpose of enabling those employees to better perform the duties of their employment.'.

Mrs. Beckett: As a first priority in the debates on the Finance Bill, we sought to examine the clause that confers tax relief on contributions to training and enterprise councils. The Opposition deliberately intended to make that the first issue we raised because we share the almost universal view that good training and retraining, for employed and unemployed alike is not only beneficial and desirable for the individual, but vital for a strong economy.

We seek by means of the amendment to probe the Government's intentions in the clause and perhaps even to improve the Bill. We do not oppose the clause itself but we believe that the more one studies it the more it throws into sharp relief the defects and inadequacies of the Government's training programme—if one can dignify it with such a name.

The background to the clause and to our amendment is also one of almost universal agreement about the terrifying inadequacies of the scale of training in this country and of the Government's approach to that training, not to mention the inadequacies—in the view of the Opposition—of such solutions as the Government propose.

It is rather difficult to tell to what degree the Government share our concern about the state of training, that state being identified by the fact that between 65 and 69 per cent. of 16 to 19-year olds are in training in this country, whereas in Germany more than 90 per cent. are, in Belgium more than 80 per cent. are, and in the United States and Japan similar figures obtain. The same imbalance applies to specific industries which need crafts-people to bring them up to strength.

We thought that the Government shared this view—all the more so because on 6 December the former Secretary of State for Employment, the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), said that Britain's training position was "mind-boggling" and because in Employment News a few months ago the word was that "we have a mountain to climb."

The former Secretary of State set targets for training: that by the end of 1992 no young person should be employed without training; that two thirds of them should get to National Council for Vocational Qualifications level and a quarter to level 3; and that by 1995 all of them should be at least at level 2, and half at level 3. He went on to say:

"Unless we set outselves these kinds of stretching targets we shall not meet the need for upgrading and multi-skilling in a decade of continuing and rapid change."

The new Secretary of State, however, said in March:

"My predecessor offered a framework of objectives for training . . . Progress . . . depends . . . on action by organisations outside Government; they cannot be specific Government targets."—[Official Report, 8 March 1990; Vol. 168, c. 804.]

Moreover, the consistent theme of the new Secretary of State has been not the great need for improved training but how well we are doing. That is a substantial shift of emphasis. As I said a few moments ago, that shift of emphasis is not universally shared. The CBI said a few months ago:

"Britain's skill levels are lower than those in most of its competitor countries and the gap is widening."

The head of the Training Agency, Roger Dawe, said:

"At every level we are towards the bottom of the training league table, whether it is in education, youth training, higher level skills training or in management."

A most interesting recent edition of "The Money Programme" had a number of comments to make on our training policies. On the programme, the chair of the Blackburn TEC said:

"The situation is desperate. We are falling further down the ladder."

Apart from the move away from targets, the new Secretary of State's second, equally alarming, shift of emphasis was to be found in the words that I have already quoted:

"Progress on meeting the objectives"— for the development of training—

"depends primarily on action by organisations outside Government; they cannot be specific Government targets."—[Official Report, 8 March 1990, Vol. 168, c. 804.]

It seems to us that the Government are in terrible danger of repeating a mistake that they have made in other areas. The one that always springs to mind is community care. It is the mistake of picking up a perfectly reasonable policy which is in itself a good idea—in this case the idea of encouraging employers to make greater efforts to provide training—and using it as an excuse to shuffle off that part of the responsibility for the policy that properly belongs to Government and use that transfer as an excuse for cuts. Therein lies the danger, and it is one that the Government are running in community care, of discrediting the whole of a policy that might otherwise be acceptable.

On the first occasion on which I met a senior business man who was involved in the early stages of setting up TECs, he talked about his enthusiasm for the idea. He spoke about the challenge of the needs of training and of the way in which he and his colleagues hoped to be able to begin to tackle it. However, he went on almost immediately to say anxiously that, although he thought it was a good idea and that he was looking forward to being involved, he hoped that the Government did not intend to transfer the entire responsibility for training to the shoulders of private industry.

That concern is widely shared and was well expressed in the edition of "The Money Programme" to which I referred. One of the people interviewed said:

"Somebody has to do it. I do not think we are necessarily the best but there is no one else."

That was a sad commentary on that person's view of the Government initiative. However, there is still a good deal of enthusiasm in some quarters for the TEC initiative, just as there might still be some enthusiasm for the intention behind the clause if the Government had not pulled the rug from under TECs by taking away with one hand what they seemed initially to be giving with the other. I refer, of course, to the cuts made by the Government in the support from public funds that were previously allotted to training. In a sense that was the unkindest cut of all and it was made without consultation with those on whom the burden of greater responsibility would inevitably devolve.

There is almost no doubt that, for most of those involved in TECs, the cut in funding was a devastating blow. They were also shattered when it took place without consultation and dismayed at the timing. Even as they warmed to their task, they were already expressing concern about the restrictions placed on the flexibility that they hoped to use to develop training and to meet the training needs in their areas. They expressed the view that reductions in scope followed directly from their duty to run the existing Government programmes of employment and youth training while their initial funding seemed to be too restrictive. It did not offer the flexibility to go further and bring in new initiatives in which they were particularly interested.

The decision substantially to cut funding has undoubtedly created immense disillusionment. In its economic report in April, the Employment Institute said that the cuts in funding are visible every year, beginning in 1988-89 with a real terms cut of 9 per cent. It was 11 per cent. in the estimate for 1989-90 and there is to be a continuing series of percentage cuts in the years ahead. The institute draws attention to the fact that, between March 1989 and March 1990, £500 million was cut from the funding of TECs.

Apart from that overall and substantial cut, individual industries are seeing the impact on the way in which they operate. I quote again from "The Money Programme" in which reference was made to the abolition of the electrical contracting industry board, its replacement by a voluntary body, and then Government money being cut in terms of the amount per head. An industrialist appearing on the programme said:

"It baffles me sometimes, the inconsistency of policies. Government can have a policy of encouraging and then the next minute, a bolt from the blue, cuts in funding."

Mr. Alan Bartlett of the Association of British Chambers of Commerce said:

"I understand what the Government are trying to do but the general feeling is that it was not appropriate for it to turn its funding taps off long before most employers had been persuaded to turn their investment taps fully on."

An editorial in the Financial Times said:

"The Government are right to argue that industry should spend more on training, but it is sending the wrong signals by sharply cutting its own spending just as TECs are trying to mobilise support."

The Government's usual excuse is that those cuts in training are justified because unemployment has been falling. Leaving aside, if one can, the fact that that fall is likely shortly to be reversed, not only have the Government cut those substantial sums, but they have cut funding per head. Even though the numbers are smaller, funding is less per head in every sector of training that the Government are in any way supporting—in employment training for the long-term unemployed, in youth training and even in training for the employed or for people such as the disabled.

4.15 pm

Nor will the clause, even amended, do much to redress the balance. The National Council for Voluntary Organisations estimated from its survey the impact of what is taking place. Again, it identifies the fact that in its view—after all, it is a training provider—employer contributions would have to treble to make good the fall in Government funding for employment training alone.

It would be interesting to know—I hope that the Financial Secretary will be able to tell us—just what impact the Government expect the clause to have. I am sure that most hon. Members will be aware that, in the Red Book, the entry for this clause is marked with an asterisk, showing that it is of insignificant proportions, which I think usually means that it is expected to be less than £3 million. That is against cuts of at least £500 million which I have already identified.

Let me give a final quote from "The Money Programme":

"If the cuts prevent us from doing something worthwhile, most of us will think it is time to go. We will give up trying to persuade the others."

That is a good employer who is concerned about training and who is prepared to give up time which, as we all know, is money, to try to promote training; to do the very thing that the Government want and which the Government are claiming to encourage. Such employers are now saying that they are prepared to give that time to try to encourage others to train, but they are not prepared to do so if the Government pull the rug from under them. Even as it stands, the clause is somewhat restrictive, whether intentionally or otherwise.

The Financial Secretary will recognise, as I expect will hon. Members, that tax deductions are already available for training. The scope will be a little greater because of the impact of the clause, but there will not be a vast change. Under section 84 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988, a deduction is available to be used for the purposes of technical education at universities and similar institutions. In sections 588 and 589, there is already a deduction for the cost of retraining employees, although with limits, and elsewhere, in section 74 under the general rules for training deductions and section 75 under expenses management, there is provision for some tax deduction.

We presume that most TEC contributions by an employer would be allocated to the local initiative fund, where the greatest flexibility exists in the operation of the TEC and where the activities are most likely to be tailored to the needs of local industry. Again, it is likely that existing law would have given a deduction for some part of the contribution and, although the relief is a little greater, it is not as generous a relief as some hon. Members might have assumed when the Chancellor announced it.

We are particularly concerned about clause 68(3), which says that the provisions identified in subsection (1) do not apply in relation to a contribution if he—the person making a contribution or an associate—

"receives or is entitled to receive a benefit of any kind whatsoever for or in connection with the making of that contribution".

We interpret that as meaning that even the smallest benefit of any kind, from anyone, will result in the whole contribution being disqualified for the purpose of tax relief. We share the Government's wish to make effective anti-avoidance law, but that provision appears to go too wide. I shall explain why that is so.

As clause 68 is worded, if a TEC agreed to train local youngsters in word processing, say, and offered free places on such a course to the employees of a particular company that had made an annual contribution of £100,000 to that TEC, because the company was receiving a benefit from those free places, it could, as a result of its past support, lose £35,000 of tax relief on its current year's contribution.

If clause 68 really means what it says, if a TEC offers contributors free access to its video production facilities, those companies might lose their right to tax relief—even though they might seldom, if ever, use the facilities.

Amendment No. 21 seeks to deal with some of those issues. Clause 68(4) says that, where relief has been given and a benefit has subsequently been received, the value of that benefit shall be chargeable for tax purposes. That implies that the Government intended in subsection (3) that only the amount of the contribution equal to the value of the benefit should be denied relief. Amendment No. 21 seeks to deny relief not if a benefit has been received but only "to the extent that" a benefit has been received. We hope and believe that that was the Government's intention.

Amendment No. 20 raises the question of whether the provision of training for a contributor's employees should be regarded as a benefit. It seems to us that it should not be so regarded, and should not result in the employer losing tax relief. If the contributing company had incurred training costs, they would have been tax deductible. If the excess of the contribution over the training costs had been paid to the TEC as a no-strings contribution, it seems that, under clause 68, tax relief would have been given. We see no reason for a different rule applying if the whole sum is given to the TEC and then it provides employee training.

Amendment No. 19 concerns a narrower issue. We understand that the Inland Revenue may be concerned in cases where a company enjoys a tax deduction by contributing a certain sum of money and is then refunded it in a tax-free form. If that is the intention of subsection (3), it can be narrowed by applying it only if the contributor receives the benefit in cash or in money's worth from the TEC, leaving intangible benefits such as the use of facilities, advertising support, and so on, untouched.

I refer finally to a possible drafting error, on which we have not tabled an amendment. I do not expect the Minister necessarily to answer the point today, but perhaps he will consider writing to me. We are concerned about interaction between subsections (1) and (2). Subsection (1) specifies that "the contributions may be deducted as an expense in computing the profits or gains of the trade" and subsection (2) refers to any such contribution

"made by an investment company"

being deductible as a management expense. Again, it appears that expenditure will not be allowable as a tax deduction under subsection (1) because it is not made by a trader for the purposes of his trade. It appears to deny the relief that subsection (2) seeks to give. If contributions are allowable under subsection (1), why is subsection (2) needed in addition?

It may be that the intention is to interpret subsection (2) as it is meant to be interpreted—but we are concerned whether the clause as drafted gives effect to the Government's intentions. Perhaps the Financial Secretary will give us an assurance that if, on re-examination, the clause is found to be defective in that respect, it will be remedied by the Government later in the Bill.

The Opposition do not oppose the clause, but the issues that it highlights expose the Government's short-term and short-sighted approach and the weakness of their case as regards the provision of training.

The Government seem to recognise no interest wider than that of the individual, which is perhaps a practical expression of the Prime Minister's view that there is no such thing as society. The Government seem to be seeing no interest wider than that of the individual employer or the group of employers and others from the locality who share representation on the training and enterprise councils. That may be the Government's view, but employers do not believe that—they have more sense. It is not the employers but the Government who are charged with the duty of defending the public interest in training, and employers recognise that.

Opposition Members commend the amendments to the Committee because they represent a small improvement to a flawed policy, but they do not affect the fact that the Government's overall policy and intention is being defeated by their actions and mistakes, and that the Bill makes only a minor contribution to our substantial training needs.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): I shall take up some of the words which have flowed from the lips of the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) when she quoted my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister as having said that there is no such thing as society. I am not sure of the context in which the hon. Lady suggests that my right hon. Friend made those remarks.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): She did say that.

Mr. Gow: Yes, but I am not sure of the context in which, according to the hon. Lady, she made that assertion.

I shall begin my remarks by quoting with approval, what a former Conservative Prime Minister said at a St. George's day dinner. Stanley Baldwin started his speech by saying:

"The responsibility for progress rests not only with the Government but upon evey man and woman in the country."

That theme seems to underline the approach of my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench to training responsibilities.

The clause grants tax relief for the current year which did not exist for the past year in respect of contributions made to training. The hon. Member for Derby, South made it clear that the Labour party would not oppose clause 68. She said perfectly properly that her amendments are probing amendments. The hon. Lady, the Labour party and I think even the two representatives of the once-mighty Liberal Party will not oppose clause 68. Therefore, the issue before the Committee this afternoon is whether the clause is an improvement upon the law which existed hitherto or whether the Government should go further, as the hon. Lady believes. She believes that the Government—which means her fellow countrymen and mine—ought to make further direct contributions towards training. My right hon. and hon. Friends on the Treasury Bench believe that there should be a partnership between the Government and industry for responsibility for training.

I welcome clause 68 because it will give additional tax relief and additional encouragement to those who have a responsibility for training—the employers. The responsibility for training rests upon employers and management. That responsibility cannot be foisted on the Government. As clause 68 provides further encouragement and additional fiscal incentives to managers and employers to carry out their responsibilities, it is a significant improvement upon the law up to 5 April 1990.

The hon. Member for Derby, South made a compelling speech, but her philosophical proposition seemed to be that the responsibility for training rests exclusively with the Government.

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): Nonsense.

Mr. Gow: That was the impression that I formed when I listened to the hon. Lady's speech. Her proposition is, I believe, misconceived. If, therefore, she presses her amendment to Division, we shall resist it.

Mrs. Beckett: If I gave that impression, let me correct it at once. The Opposition do not believe that the Government have the sole responsibility for training; we believe that it is the responsibility of many employers to train. Therefore, we regret the fact that so many employers in this country do not do so, but instead poach those who have been trained by others. We believe also that the partnership to which the hon. Gentleman referred is perfectly proper and that one side of that partnership—the Government side—is being dissolved.

4.30 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): A partnership is crucial, and many believe that the Government are not keeping to their side of the deal. We have to consider the matter in the context of the approaches to the Treasury by the spending Departments. We have read in the press that the spending Departments have put in bids worth £12 billion and that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury has said that he will be hard-pressed to pay out the £3 billion that is needed to cushion the effects of the poll tax if reductions are not made in the budgets of other spending Departments.

It is interesting to consider which Departments would bear the brunt of those reductions. It was suggested yesterday in the Financial Times that one of the budgets that would be reduced in an attempt to cushion the effects of the poll tax was the training budget. Therefore, it is fair to question the Government's real commitment to properly funded training.

The Government have cut this year's training budget by £190 million. Spending on the Department of Employment's main training programmes will be £212 million less than in 1988-89. The Government are quick to tell us at Question Time that that is due to the fall in the number of young people, but that is not the reason for the reduction. Spending per head on youth training has been cut by £8 a week.

It is widely believed that the training and enterprise councils have been set up by the Government in an attempt to get training done privately and to keep it in the background. They are not interested in ensuring that it is properly supported by a partnership between the state and industry. It is an attempt by the Government to shuffle off their responsibilities and hope that the private sector will pick up the tab, and at the same time leave the Government the leeway to carry through further reductions. That is the prevailing view, even within the TECs.

The TECs were relatively unpopular and hard to get off the ground when they were first introduced. The tax reductions and concessions in clause 68 are an attempt to increase the incentives—a bigger carrot—in the hope that enterprises will continue to contribute to TECs on a scale that will make up for Government reductions. It is clear that the initial enthusiasm of some employers is waning, and the scheme needs a boost.

That is the purpose of the clause. The promised levels of public funding for TECs have not been forthcoming, and participating employers are becoming reluctant to contribute to TECs when they see that the public budget —the Government's commitment to that partnership— has been cut back, squeezed and reduced.

I hope that the Financial Secretary can assure the House that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury will not cut the Department of Employment's training budget, and that training will not pay the price for the cushioning of the poll tax. Already the Employment Institute is calling for "an increased public contribution to each TEC."

Mr. Russ Mason of the Thames Valley TEC has said that TECs are a "picture of inadequate funding, particularly in the start-up year".

That is precisely the year when they need guarantees of investment and income.

Dorset TEC has had its funding for 1990-91 cut by 18 per cent. As a result, it has been forced to cut its programmes. While the Labour party would be keen and eager to back genuine training that is properly supported in a partnership between Government and business, the Government must ensure that they underpin their commitment to that partnership rather than undermining it. We know that Secretaries of State and other Ministers are in the background, bidding with the Treasury to ensure that their Departments' budgets are not reduced in these difficult times.

The TECs have not been built on principles of partnership, or democratic principles; there are no employee representatives on their boards. There is no policy underwriting to ensure that the special needs of people with disabilities, women—whom the Government now claim that they are eager to bring into the work force —and ethnic minorities are provided for in the TECs. Positive action and programmes for such people would be welcome. They would turn the Government's training policies into genuine training policies. Such policies require a high level of commitment through public funding: that is part of the partnership.

I hope that the Government will accept their responsibility. It would be nonsense for them to suggest that TECs are providing employment opportunities for all when they cannot do that as their budgets are being persistently cut and undermined.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Other speakers, especially the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett), have already pointed out that we are debating training at a time when our provision is at a low ebb compared with that of our competitors. That can be illustrated by reference to statistics. Only about 32 per cent. of young people in Britain stay on at school until they are 18, compared to some 76 per cent. in the United States and 95 per cent. in Japan. Figures show that about 39 per cent. of 16 and 17-year-olds are currently in full-time education; 9 per cent. are unemployed; 24 per cent. are on youth training schemes; and 30 per cent. are in employment. Those in employment often receive no training. A recent survey suggested that only 5 per cent. were on day release schemes. So we start at a competitive disadvantage compared with those with whom we shall shortly be competing on even more equal terms once the single market becomes further established.

Against that background, the Government's response in recent White Papers has been to set up TECs in England and Wales and local enterprise companies in Scotland. Just as they are getting under way in England and Wales and are about to be inaugurated in Scotland, the Government introduce the new clause, which my hon. Friends and I will not oppose. But what the Government are giving by way of tax incentives they are taking away through the cuts that are about to take place in the training budget.

Hon. Members who, like me, are not members of the Select Committee on Employment will have seen recent televised exchanges in that Committee with the chairman of the Training Agency who, when put under pressure, eventually admitted that, with training already in a poor state in Britain, the amount actually to be spent on training, once one removed all the frills, would be cut. I understand that the youth training budget will be cut by 25 per cent. over three years, which in real terms approximates to 45 per cent.

The Financial Secretary will probably reply by referring to the demographic changes that are taking place and the fact that there are fewer youngsters in the age group to which youth training applies. But as we accept that more should be spent on training, we have a wonderful opportunity to take advantage of those demographic changes and increase in real terms the amount that we spend on training.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): My hon. Friend may recall that, when the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee examined witnesses on that point, they claimed that expenditure could be reduced on training because there were now fewer people unemployed, which, apart from being a doubtful prophecy for the months ahead, suggests that the Government's view is that training is necessary only when people are out of work. That represents an extraordinary failure to grasp the training problems that we face.

Mr. Wallace: My hon. Friend, who is a distinguished member of that Select Committee, makes a valid point to which I shall return. The TECs and LECs are about to be given a remit for training, a substantial part of which is taken up with their being administrators of national training schemes—youth and employment training— which, in different parts of the country and in their own ways, no doubt have some merit, but which go nowhere near to addressing the real problems of training, in particular the need to train those who are already in employment.

We must consider the effects of the cuts in training expenditure. Figures I was given last week by the Shetland Islands council show that, in the current year, there will be a 10 per cent. cut there in training. About £21,000 per annum will be withdrawn from training in Shetland. I understand that a similar cut will apply in the Orkney Islands council part of my constituency. That is the first of a number of instalments, and further cuts are to take place next year.

[Mr. Wallace]

Although cuts are taking place and new contracts are coming into operation at the end of this month, there has been precious little consultation up to now about how the transition is to be achieved. One wonders, with the Government putting greater emphasis on TECs and LECs in the provision of training, what role the Government see for local authority involvement in training.

4.45 pm

In my constituency, the role of the local authority in pump-priming and giving additional funds to assist with training has been important, not least in helping those with special needs. If the Government see no real role for local authorities and continue to put pressure on their expenditure in other directions, we are in danger of handing over responsibility to the private sector and losing what has been a valuable partnership with the involvement of local authorities. How does the Minister see the future role of local authorities in supporting training in their localities?

Coming to the TECs and LECs, with which the clause is concerned, the Government are taking a risk. If training is vital to our country's interests and they represent the main mechanism by which training is to be delivered, it must be in the interests of all hon. Members to be sure that that mechanism works. There is no point in wishing the TECs and LECs ill, and to the extent that the clause tries to assist what they are doing, it is to be welcomed.

As I say, it is a risk. After all, in its White Paper entitled "Scottish Enterprise", the Scottish Office was more blunt than its English and Welsh counterparts about the role of the private sector up to now. That White Paper said:

> "Efforts to date to persuade the private sector to take greater interest in and responsibility for training have had disappointing results. Far too many firms take little interest in assessing and training for their own future needs, assuming that supply will always be there to meet demand."

Now, having admitted the failure of the private sector, the Government are putting so many eggs in that basket that one hopes that they have properly weighed up the risk involved.

As I said in response to the intervention by my hon. Friend the Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), we have training that will be particularly geared to employment training and the youth training scheme, with not enough attention being given to what can be done to provide training for those who are already in employment, for those with special needs and, as the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) pointed out, for the training and encouragement of women.

An obvious example is the special allowances for employment training that are available to single parents but are not available to married women. A number of married women in my constituency have made representations to me that they would be only too willing to take up employment training if they had that additional resource. It is a short-term attitude—we frequently see such an attitude being taken by the Government—to encourage more women into the workplace without providing additional incentives. Will the TECs have flexibility to encourage training for women?

The prospectus for the 1990s entitled "Training and Enterprise Councils", issued by the Department of Employment last year, stated:

> "At least two-thirds of the directors . . . must be local business leaders . . . who are 'chairmen, chief executives or top operational managers at local level of major companies.'"

I welcome the effort that is being made to encourage local top people from business to take that interest, although I sometimes wonder whether they are sure of the level of commitment that they are making.

There could be an inadequacy in going for chief executives and top business leaders. We accept that, over the years, British business has been woefully inadequate in providing training. The trouble is that many of those at the top know precious little about training. They do not have expertise and skill in training. I hope that that point will be taken on board by those running the TECs and LECs.

We need to provide for trainers, not just for trainees. We need people with skill and experience in training. The editorial in the Financial Times of 9 May 1990, to which the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) referred, pointed out:

> "The UK's educational reforms are threatened by a lack of qualified teachers. The same constraint applies in youth and adult training; the difference is that it is almost certainly more severe. After decades of neglect and the near disappearance of traditional apprenticeships in many industries, the UK lacks the human resources required for a training revolution."

It is important for the TECs to address that problem.

Linked to that is the need to stimulate a culture of training. People must want to learn, and I agree with those who say that this matter cannot be left entirely to the state, the Government or local authorities. They cannot command people to learn and train. It is up to all concerned—industry, parents and the schools—to generate an atmosphere in which young people see it as worth their while to stay on and achieve educational attainment or to go on a training course, and at the end of whatever they do they must see some reward for their training efforts.

We must examine the experience of other countries. For example, firms in France that provide less training than the average in their sector pay the extra costs of the firms that provide above-average amounts of training.

As I said in my opening remarks, other countries seem to manage training so much better than we do. We should not be ashamed or hesitant about looking at their experience and adapting some of what they do. By setting so much store by TECs and LECs, the Government are taking a risk which, if it does not come off, will put us even further behind.

Mr. Lilley: First, I welcome the good will that has been shown by hon. Members on both sides of the House towards the substance of the clauses, although there is disagreement about what has been omitted from them and concern about some matters which the amendments address. Before I continue, let me make one general observation. Although we have had a great deal of talk about the amount of money dedicated to training, and the involvement of the public and private sectors, so far in the debate there has been no mention of specific skills or the training curriculum.

Perhaps it is an indictment of us all, and the difference between our attitude and that on the continent, that when we talk about training we think about how much money we spend and not about the output of training, which is crucial. That is why the Government attach so much importance to TECs. We believe that the involvement of industry in the process of providing and managing training will ensure that it is orientated more to the generation of training suitable to the needs of people and businesses, and not simply to abstract management and spending a certain amount of money.

The hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) began with an accurate description of the training desert and the total lack of Government provision for school leavers that we inherited from the last Labour Government. At that time there was no youth training scheme or equivalent of employment training, there was no direct involvement of industry in the provision and management of training, there were no training credits, for which pilot schemes are now being announced, and there was little or no contact between schools and industry. There has been a huge change on all those fronts.

Mrs. Beckett: The Minister is right in listing all those provisions which did not exist then, but there also was not mass unemployment on a scale that made a training scheme necessary to take people off the unemployment registers. There was also a substantial number of high-quality apprenticeships run by private companies. From memory, I believe that a training company initiative to promote further training in the private sector was one of the first things that the present Government cancelled when they took office, and there was a campaign of co-operation between industry and schools. Another thing that the Government cancelled when they took office was the programme that we had started to put computers into schools, but they later reversed that decision. Whatever the Minister may imagine, I assure him that the picture he paints does not represent what was happening under the last Labour Government.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Lady is entitled to her view that everything was all right then, but I am inclined to think that there has been a long-term weakness. We have taken a decade to get it right, but we are now getting it right.

We are now spending £900 million a year on youth training and £1·2 billion on employment training, and we have announced pilot programmes for training credits. The LECs will control some £2 billion out of a total budget of £2·5 billion of Government money to be spent on training. That is all good news, but the real improvement on a much larger scale has occurred in the private provision and expenditure on training. One estimate mentioned by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech is that no less than £20 billion a year is being spent by private industry on training. I am sure that we all welcome that.

Last night, the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) reminded us of the hon. Lady's assurance that the Labour party has no spending demands beyond the two commitments to social security spending. Some scepticism was expressed in the House about whether the Labour party would be able to limit its demands for extra spending to those two commitments and, sure enough, the hon. Lady has broken her own self-denying ordinance today and called for more spending on training. The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) joined in.

Mr. Battle: The Minister will have read the account in the Financial Times—perhaps he will say that it is a speculative newspaper report—that the budget for training in the Department of Employment was to be reduced. What action did he take when he read that report?

Mr. Lilley: I certainly do not take action every time I read reports in the Financial Times; if I did, I should be hyperactive.

The public expenditure round proceeds on its stately course every year and all sorts of reports are made in the newspapers in ignorance of what is really happening. However, it is clear that the number of young people requiring post-school training and, happily, the number of people who have been long-term unemployed is diminishing. That means that more people are in work where they should be receiving training from employers in private companies and in the state sector, and that is what is happening.

The hon. Lady asked specifically what is the likely impact of the clause. Obviously, that is impossible to assess as it is an enabling clause which will remove the disincentive to companies from making contributions to local employment companies.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister said that young people who are in work should be receiving their training there and that is what is happening. What is his evidence for that? Does he contradict the recent survey that I quoted showing that only 5 per cent. of 16 and 17-year olds in employment were getting day release to undertake further training? What is his information?

Mr. Lilley: I recall hearing one of my colleagues in the Department of Employment referring to some European statistics showing that a high and rising proportion of people in Britain are receiving training, and that we are beginning to compare favourably with a number of our continental competitors. That is good news.

It is impossible to assess the likely response to the removal of a disincentive, but a similar incentive exists for contributions to local enterprise agencies which have raised some £35 million in recent years. Therefore, a significant but by no means enormous sum of money may be raised. The contributions that companies are making are very good news and demonstrate their sense of responsibility to their neighbourhoods and their recognition of the benefits that ultimately flow back to them from a better training environment.

The hon. Lady asked whether a company would lose relief if it received training after making a gift, and particularly if it were the condition of making a gift. I reassure the hon. Lady that it would not. There is already full relief for any expenditure by a company on the provision of training for its own staff, whether it provides it on its own premises or whether it buys in training from a LEC or elsewhere. The clause will simply ensure that there will be relief for purely altruistic contributions which might not otherwise exist as LECs are not charities. The hon. Lady suggested in her amendments—which are helpful and well-intentioned; we accept their underlying spirit—that relief should be removed only in so far as there is any benefit. I thought about that, but it does not seem necessary and it would certainly add an extra burden of complexity.

The hon. Lady also asked about a possible drafting error in subsections (1) and (2). I shall examine the point and write to her, although I have been given a preliminary indication that there is no problem. It is a tribute to her assiduity that she should have discovered a potential error.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West rightly referred to the importance of provision for the handicapped and other special needs groups. I assure him that training and enterprise councils must set out plans for the provision that they will make for the handicapped and others before they can sign a contract. Obviously that matter will be considered carefully before a contract is signed.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) said that other countries managed their training much better than us and that we should learn from them. Training and enterprise councils are being established partly because of the lessons we learned abroad. Germany has been successful: a major part in managing and providing training there is played by chambers of commerce. We do not have the same network of statutory chambers of commerce, but TECs will essentially involve business in the provision and management of training in a similar way, so we hope that we are learning from others.

Technically we are discussing simply the amendments before us. I have responded specifically to those by saying that we accept their spirit but feel that they are unnecessary and might lead to unnecessary complications. I hope that the Committee will not take them to a vote.

Mr. Battle: I found it surprising that the Minister said that the amendments would be too complicated. He said that, if a company gained benefit, it would lose the whole carrot and that it was not possible to find a way round that. We should encourage employers to come forward. Their record in the past has been bleak. That is why the Government have had to take the lead.

The skills shortage is not a new phenomenon. In 1982, when I served as a councillor on Leeds city council, it was involved, with the local chambers of commerce, in examining the skills needs of the future. Those were the years of recession in the engineering industry and in clothing and textiles. With the dismantling of some training boards, a shortage of some skills emerged precisely in the industries with new technology. The skills shortage was being identified then, eight or nine years ago, so it is not a new phenomenon. Yet the record of companies in providing training has not been commendable. The Government have been forced to offer tax concessions to employers to encourage them to take training seriously.

I welcome the Minister's response to the points about the disabled, women and ethnic minorities, but they need stronger emphasis. I am interested in the background to the clause and what will have to be agreed before a contract is signed. In the past companies have not been ready to provide schemes to train the disabled and women, and we may have to cajole them again. I hope the Minister agrees that it is not the case of the Government's saying, "We will have a partnership now."

There are problems about the Government's sticking to their funding contribution. I was not happy with the Minister's response on budget speculation. There should be hard bids. If the Secretary of State for Employment believes that he should work in partnership with companies, he should defend the employment and training budget and ensure that the Treasury will not cut the provision in order to cushion the poll tax.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): My hon. Friend has referred to gaps in training. Did he see "The Money Programme" to which my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has referred? In that programme we heard that invisibles had declined since 1986 and that, for the first time since the Napoleonic wars, we had a deficit in our invisible trade. One reason was that there was very little organised training for specialist functions in the financial sector. I do not think that the Minister can blame that on a Labour Government.

Mr. Battle: My hon. Friend makes a telling point.

The identification of skills shortages has not been a new phenomenon. As industry has changed, there has been a shift from manufacturing to service. In Leeds, we set up training institutes to train women, people from the ethnic minorities and the disabled to enable them to enter jobs requiring new technology skills.

The Government are trying to cajole employers to fall in with their plans. Unless the Government are prepared to keep their side of the partnership bargain and give a real commitment that the training will not be subject to annual budget dealing which may put the partnership at risk, how can employers be persuaded to put in cash? We agree with the clause, but we think that our amendment should be acceptable. The Financial Secretary said that he accepted the spirit of our proposals. Why can he not accept the content?

Mr. Lilley: I shall respond specifically to the initial concern of the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) about whether the amendments are necessary to avoid frightening people off. These subsections are essentially about avoidance. They are to prevent abuse of the scheme; there is nothing particularly novel about it. There is an identical provision in the legislation that provides tax relief for contributions to local enterprise agencies. Its purpose is to ensure that relief is not available for contributions with strings attached—for example, a contribution made on the understanding that the training and enterprise council would later provide training for a member of the contributor's family in something not connected with the contributor's business. We do not want abuse where a firm will make a gift, with a rider attached that a nephew will get training on something wholly unconnected with the business. The purpose of the subsections is to see off that potential abuse.

We did not find difficulties in the case of an almost identical provision for local enterprise agencies. I do not imagine difficulties will arise in this case. Precisely because the provision is to see off improper strings being attached to gifts, there is no case for saying that, as the improper string cost only £4,000, tax relief should be lost on only £4,000. If there is abuse and an attempt at nepotism, it is better that it should be seen off outright by the loss of tax relief in its entirety. That is why the provision is set out as it is. I am sorry that I did not spell it out at greater lengths earlier. I am glad to have had the opportunity to do so in response to the hon. Gentleman's request for further clarification.

Mrs. Beckett: We have had an interesting though short debate. The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), whose courtesy I appreciate, made, as always, a telling and effective speech. The hon. Gentleman said that responsibility for progress in training—and I think that he said that he was quoting Balfour, or perhaps it was Baldwin—rests with every man and woman in the country and, of course, we do not dispute that. He also said that there was a need to maintain a partnership between Government and industry in the provision of training. I am happy to place on record once more the point that I made in an intervention in his speech. We recognise, of course, that it has always been the case—and we hope that it always will be—that there is a great need for industry to provide good training. Nevertheless, we believe, as industry does, that the provision of such training is a partnership between Government and industry. There is a growing belief and concern that the Government are failing to provide their side of the partnership.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) remarked in his first contribution on the way in which the cuts in training have been made not just in the overall budget, but in the provision of training and the cost of training being allowed per head. Again, the answer is giving in Cm 1006. In paragraph 26, table 6.5, which refers to youth training—frequently quoted in the House and outside—shows clearly the decline in the gross public cost per trainee week, not only in the estimated outturn for 1989-90, but in the coming year and the two succeeding years. It estimates a fall from about £50 per head in 1989-90 to about £33 a head by 1992-93. There is no doubt that that will be a substantial cut and will have a damaging effect.

The Financial Times editorial, which I quoted earlier, made explicitly the point that the Opposition so often try to make to the Government and which they tend to contest —that it is not possible to provide high quality training on the cheap, which the Government are attempting to do.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) talked especially about the training needs and problems identified in Scotland, and about the training needs of women and the disabled which, of course, we very much endorse.

The Financial Secretary has shown previously a trait —and I am not sure whether it is because he writes his speeches in advance and does not like to amend them——

Mr. Lilley: No.

Mrs. Beckett: If I have insulted the Financial Secretary, I apologise. However, he has a tendency to make remarks that do not seem to some of us to be borne out by the debate. In this case, he said that the only worry expressed by the Opposition was about the provision of public funds and that nothing had been said about the detail of training.

That is not wholly accurate. I referred to the various targets that were needed. It is certainly the case that the Opposition in a variety of ways, including through our members of the Select Committee on Employment, have studied and been alarmed by the detail of what is happening in training. My hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) gave some examples in the Budget debate which were taken from studies of sector training organisations obtained by our hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), who is Chairman of the Select Committee on Employment.

It is worth reminding the House of one or two of the points that my hon. Friend the Member for Sedgefield identified. There is likely to be a shortfall by the middle of the 1990s of 50,000 trained people in information technology. The computer services industry council presently covers 44,000 people and that number is soon to increase substantially. At present, it has five full-time staff only, although it is an area of great need in which we have a substantial deficit. The national retailing training council covers 2·5 million people, but it has only five full-time staff. The United Kingdom Agricultural Supply Trade Association has 1·25 people covering the entire association. Only 0·6 of a person—and I do not know how the figure was arrived at—covers the National Association of Master Bakers, Confectioners and Caterers. The detailed studies of training confirm the alarm we expressed in the debate. I believe that only one in four companies train.

The Financial Secretary then referred to the training desert. I thought that we were experiencing a wholly new phenomenon of commendable frankness, with Ministers admitting to sins of commission or omission, but I should have known better. He was talking about the previous Labour Government. I seem to recall that you, Mr. Walker, were a luminary adorning the Department of Employment. The Financial Secretary is fortunate that you are not in a position to set him straight by joining in our debate. Few who had any experience in the area would recognise the Financial Secretary's picture of the state of training then.

5.15 pm

The Financial Secretary referred to Opposition pressure on the Government to restore cuts in the provision of training to which we have referred in the debate. I am not sure whether it is deliberate on the part of the Ministers, or whether they simply have not grasped the distinction. In case it is the latter, let me make it plain. When we talk about the present public expenditure White Paper, about the present Budget or about Government policies, we set those remarks in the context of what we think that the Government should be doing now. We think that they should now be restoring the cuts they made in the training budget. It was in that context——

Mr. Lilley: Spending more?

Mrs. Beckett: Yes, spending more. The Government should spend enough to restore the cuts they made in the training budget in the public expenditure White Paper. The Minister should recall that I made a similar point earlier, although I am not sure that he was paying quite the close attention that I should have liked to every word I said. I drew his attention then to the fact that, in the debate on the public expenditure White Paper, when we called for the restoration of the cuts in spending, we made several proposals about areas in which we thought that the Government were making mistaken choices in spending money and in which we would not spend money, and several other proposals about areas in which the Government were making cuts and in which we would not make cuts.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Does my hon. Friend agree that our concern for a full-hearted Government partnership for training is not just with the overall level of spending? We are concerned that training should be carried out not as a privatised entity, but within the framework of overall social objectives. In my constituency, the unemployment rate among young black males is one in two. Society will pay a terrible price for the Government's policy. The Government seek to back away from their responsibility for training. The training needs of young men in areas such as Hackney, inner London, Manchester and Birmingham are ignored. This country will pay a terrible price for the Government's lack of seriousness on training, not just in terms of overall finance, but in terms of the overall social objectives which a serious Government policy on training should have.

Mrs. Beckett: Yes, I whole-heartedly endorse what my hon. Friend has said. Her observations about the way in which all of us draw on our experience of our constituencies and the problems there challenge the Government's view about the problems and the nature of the difficulties.

I reiterate for the benefit of the Financial Secretary, and in the perhaps vain hope that we shall not need to have these conversations over and over again that we proposed the restoration of the cuts in the public expenditure White Paper and that we also proposed cuts in spending in areas where we thought that the Government were misdirecting. I assure the hon. Gentleman that, broadly speaking, the cuts that we proposed and the cuts that we opposed balanced out. I assure him that there was no net increase in public expenditure in our package, which fits into the context of my remarks about our plans.

That brings me to my second point on the issue. The training cuts that we were discussing were in the context of what the Government are doing this year and what we think that they should be doing. When we referred to what a Labour Government would do, possibly in one year or two years—neither the Financial Secretary nor I can predict that—we were referring to a different framework. At the moment we have a couple of specific, clearly identified commitments which are our priorities. Beyond them, there are several desirable directions in which we should like public expenditure to move, but which we cannot quantify now. There is a clear distinction there and I assure the Financial Secretary that there was no contradiction in the points made by Opposition Members.

As we have identified, the overall context of clause 68 is one of encouraging business, through tax reliefs, to contribute to training programmes in TECs. It has been suggested in the press, and I am not aware that the Government have contradicted it, that the Government are drawing on the American experience. I remind the Financial Secretary of an article that appeared in The Economist on 21 April 1990. The article included several not very encouraging remarks about the Government's plans. It said that business men had responded to the Government's arguments with glum faces and that they were complaining that the Government might have shifted expenditure rather than reduced total investment. The article continued:

at the models for these proposals

"deepens the gloom. Despite a strong American tradition of corporate largesse," the equivalent proposal in the United States

"has never received more than a tiny proportion of their money from private industry."

The article explains that one of the most successful training schemes in the country, in Philadelphia, raises only about 5 per cent. of its budget from the private sector.

The Economist, which is not exactly a left-wing magazine, stated that the Secretary of State "and his colleagues could hardly have chosen a more effective way"— that is, through the cuts—

"of sending a negative signal to a movement which stands or falls on voluntary effort. Some businessemen are asking themselves why they should be generous with their time and energy when the public budget is being squeezed and their own discretion to spend it is being so tightly constrained."

The Economist suggests that some more cynical souls are wondering whether the Government are trying to offload responsibility, even for the training schemes that they run at present.

Mrs. Mahon: Is my hon. Friend aware that the chairman of the Blackburn TEC threatened to resign because of the cuts in funding?

Mrs. Beckett: I was not aware that the chairman of the Blackburn TEC had threatened to resign. However, judging from the strength of his remarks and his depressed tone that he revealed in a television programme that I saw, I am sorry to say that I am not surprised to learn that he has threatened to resign.

An article in The Guardian on 21 March 1990 referred to the leader of a midlands TEC. The article said that the Government were trying to place responsibility on the private sector for providing training. The article was lukewarm about the proposals in clause 68.

I listened with care to the observations made by the Financial Secretary, and I am glad that the Government do not believe that people would lose as a result of the difficulties that we identified and which we sought to address in amendment No. 21. The Financial Secretary believes that our amendment is unnecessary. However, we are not entirely convinced. I do not mean to criticise the Financial Secretary when I say that the drafting of legislation is an issue on which the Government's record is, how can I put it——

Ms. Abbott: Shocking?

Mrs. Beckett: Shocking is probably the best way to put it. I was going to be more gentle than that. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott) has probably described it better.

We have extensive experience of the Government assuring the House, in all good faith, that this or that provision in a clause meant this or that and was correctly drafted. However, we then discovered, sometimes before a Bill had completed all its stages and sometimes not until a subsequent year, that that was not so. I believe that there are some clauses in this Bill that correct something that the Government said did not need correcting from last year's Finance Act.

With respect to the Minister, if amendment No. 21 would do no harm and is merely regarded as unnecessary, we are inclined to press it to a Division. We have reservations about whether payment, not "wholly and exclusively", as needed by section 74 of the Act will cover the case to which the Financial Secretary referred. Of course, we understand his point about drafting the clause to stop people, according to his example, providing training or education for a nephew. We would not want people to avoid tax. However, although we share the Financial Secretary's desire to rule out tax avoidance—we wish that the Government shared our view about that more often—we believe that the Bill as drafted goes over the top. I intend to advise my hon. Friends to vote for amendment No. 21.

In conclusion, I want to quote from the ubiquitous and extremely useful "Money Programme". That programme placed the context of this debate in a clear light. One of the contributors to the programme said:

"We are moving away from the practices of our most successful competitors who supplement the market in training and regulate it heavily. We are moving towards complete dependence on the market."

Unfortunately, that is the answer for the hon. Member for Eastbourne. We are very concerned about that and that is why we raise the issue and why I advise my hon. Friends, despite the assurance from the Financial Secretary, to be on the safe side and support amendment No. 21.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): With regard to this so-called incentive that the Government are giving to businesses in the form of tax relief to encourage them to take on their responsibilities for training, I must tell the Financial Secretary that we were telling the Government years ago that they were destroying the training of this nation.

Ms. Abbott: And would they listen?

Mr. Haynes: No, they would not. In fact, we were saying that before the young Minister became a Member of this House. I am sure that you, Mr. Walker, will remember this. I remember you at the Dispatch Box telling the Government of the day where they were going wrong on training.

The Financial Secretary should listen to these things, which have had to be said about training. The Government have missed the boat. They are trying to pour a little money into the pockets of the employers to have what the Government believe will be a sensible and successful training programme. I was a member of the Standing Committee that considered the Employment Bill, the Report stage of which we will debate on Thursday. In that Committee, Ministers tried to tell us what they were going to do about training. They are part of a Government who have almost destroyed training in this country.

Ministers now squeal at the Dispatch Box that we do not have enough people with the skills to do the new jobs that are becoming available in the new technologies. They are bawling their eyes out. Even the Prime Minister at No. 10 is doing that. The Prime Minister and the Ministers on the Treasury Bench have some lessons to learn. I am sure that, like me, Mr. Walker, you remember the training programmes that we used to have. The responsibility then was where it should be. This Government have a responsibility, but they are trying to duck out of it by chucking a bit of corn down. It will not work, and it will not help the Government to stay in office at the next general election. The Government have failed the people who need training, especially youngsters coming out of school.

In the Minister's constituency as well as in mine, young people are put on so-called "training programmes", when they push brushes around a factory floor for about two years, but there is no job at the end of it for them, and we are now finding out that there will be an increase in unemployment because of the Government's policies.

The Government have wasted money, and that has been at the expense of the ordinary folk that the Financial Secretary is supposed to represent and I certainly represent, back in the beautiful country of Nottinghamshire, where the Government have destroyed industry. Our mining industry used to have a first-class training programme, but what did that lot on the Treasury Bench do? They closed the pits, with the result that the training programme has been lost as well.

5.30 pm

As I have said, the Government are chucking a bit of corn on to the floor of the Chamber in the hope that the employers will pick it up. The Ministers and the Government have another think coming because that will not happen. The Financial Secretary must have heard what my hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has just said about only one in four employers being interested in training. That is shocking. All of them should be involved. The Government should be encouraging employers to train.

The Financial Secretary has a little grin on his face, but I am trying to be serious for a change. Let us face it, from time to time I have sat in the Chamber and been bored to tears. The Government have poured out statistics until I am sick of hearing them. Sometimes we hear a speech that livens up the debate and which hon. Members enjoy, including you, Mr. Walker. I have seen you with a smile on your face sometimes. Indeed, you are smiling right now.

Nevertheless, training is a serious matter. It is all very well to dangle a carrot before the people who are supposed to be providing a proper training, but the Government have ducked their real responsibiiity for a number of years.

I shall give an example of an industry in my constituency that encourages the training of disabled people without any encouragement from that lot on the Treasury Bench. It has done so ever since I have been a Member of the House. Provisions governing the employment of disabled people are supposed to be on the statute book. Although firms do not have to follow the provisions, it is recommended that about 3 per cent. of the work force should comprise disabled people. In the firm that I am talking about, disabled people make up 3·5 per cent. of the work force and they are trained, which is how it should work but, oh no, training has gone down, down, and downhill under the Government.

Give us the opportunity at the next general election —I am sure that it is coming—and my party will sit on the Government Benches and do something about training programmes. My hon. Friend the Member for Derby, South has spelt out what should be done, but I do not think that the Financial Secretary was listening to her. He was gas-bagging to whoever was sitting next to him——

Mr. Lilley: Withdraw.

Mr. Haynes: No, I shall not withdraw that, because it is true. With my own eyes I saw the Financial Secretary gas-bagging instead of listening to the serious points being made. I am pleased that he is listening to me when I am trying to be serious because we are discussing a serious subject.

The Financial Secretary was lucky enough to have a bit of training in finance—at least, that is the impression I get when I listen to him speak from the Dispatch Box. Nevertheless, he has a lot to learn. I said the same thing last night, but from a sedentary position. The young Minister has a lot to learn—he has not lived yet. I was in industry for many years and I am now 64, so the Minister can understand the point of what I am saying. I have seen good industry and good training within industry. Indeed, I participated in that training.

[Mr. Haynes]

The Government ducked their responsibilities when they took over in 1979. Come the next election, we shall change all that. The sooner the Prime Minister calls the election, the better off will be those people who need proper training—without the incentives and the corn that the Government are chucking down to employers.

Several Hon. Members rose——

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): The debate is now getting wide, and although I have allowed a wide debate, I shall obviously have to have regard to the extent to which we have debated the general matters relating to the clause when we come to debate clause stand part. I call Mr. Martlew.

Mr. Haynes: On a point of order, Mr. Walker. I promised earlier not to raise any points of order, but you have forced me to my feet. I hope that on Thursday when we debate the Employment Bill you will not say that I have gone wide of the scope of the debate.

Mr. Walker: Thursday is a long way off. I call Mr. Martlew.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I shall try to stick to the scope of our amendments and the need for them. Eleven years of this Government have reduced us from a skilled to a semi-skilled nation. I am afraid that, if the Conservative party won another election, we would be reduced to being an unskilled nation.

If one wants to consider the decline in training in this country, one most go back to the legislation that destroyed the training boards. A Labour Government in the 1960s put in place a system that did not give incentives to employers, but approached training from the other direction. A levy was imposed on employers who had to provide training of a certain standard to receive a rebate.

That immediately created the position of training officer. I was one for quite a while. Originally, the function of a training officer was to recoup the amount of the levy, but they soon went beyond that and started to look at companies' training needs. We found that very little training had been done between 1951, when the Conservatives took over, and 1964. Therefore, there was a need for Government intervention and the training boards were set up.

I was involved with the food, drink and tobacco training board, which began as a bureaucratic organisation, but which created a high standard of skills in many of the companies involved. Unfortunately, that training board was destroyed. I recently served on the Committee considering the Food Safety Bill, a major proposal of which was that training in the food industry should be dramatically increased because the lack of training has contributed to the food poisoning epidemic in this country. That lack of training in the industry was caused by the Government allowing the industry to stop training.

At one time, we used to have the right number of skilled people to match the number of jobs, but in the many years since, the Government have decimated our apprenticeships. Industry thought in the short term; because it was expensive to train an apprentice—it could amount to about £20,000 per year—firms decided to recruit direct from the labour market. Those industries are paying for that now, because there is a skills shortage and people with skills are rightly selling them to the highest bidder.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer stands at the Dispatch Box complaining about the high level of wage increases, but one reason is that the Government themselves have created a skills shortage, by destroying our training systems, which in turn means that those with the skills are demanding the highest price for them.

Mrs. Mahon: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is ironic that the Government, who are attempting to privatise training with the formation of the TECs, have put in charge of the TECs the very people who failed to provide the training in the first place?

Mr. Martlew: I could not agree more with my hon. Friend. I was discussing this matter about a year ago with one of the senior managers of a Carlisle company, who asked me what I thought about TECs. I said that I was concerned that those in charge would be the very people who had neglected training in their own companies over many years. Fortunately, one or two of the individuals on the board of the Cumbrian TEC are of a high calibre, and hopefully they will be able to carry on the job. However, one of their worries, which I share, is that they will not be given the tools and money to carry out the job. In addition, they will not have the support of the work force for TECs, because there are no workers' representatives on the TECs boards, which is another mistake, and is based on dogma, not common sense.

A common-sense Government who were concerned about improving training and getting the TECs off the ground would have gone for a consensus approach, but the word "consensus" has been struck out of the dictionaries of Conservative Members. I think that the Prime Minister struck out the word, but I think that the Government will rue the day.

The Opposition have said many harsh words about youth training schemes over the years, some of which have been justified. I used to be what was called a managing agent for a youth training scheme, and I used to take great pride in helping youngsters who came to my company through that initial period from school to work.

I was not a great believer in the idea that the YTS was an ideal way to train youths, but it was better than the dole. There was no doubt that it made youngsters aware of the work ethic—it got them up in the morning, coming to work and used to working with other people. Given a reasonable level of resources and a company that did not want to make a profit out of YTS kids, the scheme just about managed to give them a decent, reasonable level of training. The company that I worked for did so; many of the youngsters continued to work for that company, and some got apprenticeships afterwards.

To start to reduce in real terms the amount of money put into YTS schemes is an insult to those youngsters who have been unable to find employment but do not want to opt out. Many youngsters decide that they do not want to be exploited by youth training schemes and do not become involved. The youngsters who will be penalised are those who have decided to get up in the morning and do something. The Government are saying to them that they will get second-rate training, in a scheme that was not ideal to start with. The reason for reducing the amount of money will be lost. I hope that the Minister will tell us why he proposes a reduction in the amount of money spent on YTS youngsters.

We should have been building on the resources already there, and putting in more. Most of our youngsters not going on to higher education should be going into training schemes, highly geared to giving us the skilled work force required for the 1990s. This country does not have the natural resources of many of its competitors. North sea oil will run out before long. How will we adjust our balance of payments problems if we do not have a skilled work force?

Are we to become screwdriver workers in screwdriver factories for the Japanese? Why are we not opening car factories in Japan? The reason is that the Government have got the training wrong. We have not got the skills, either managerial or further down. Unless the Government start to apply themselves seriously to where the country is going and what sort of work force it will need in future, we shall become an unskilled work force, depending on Japanese, Germans and Swedes, to provide not only the factories, but the quality training. That is what we have lost.

I do not believe the TECs will work. We must be more interventionist than that. We must say to employers that they must make a contribution—not a voluntary one, but a levy that they will receive back when they reach the standard required. The free market will fail this country every time in training, because it takes the short view; training needs a long view, because it is a long-term investment. The Government give us no encouragement to believe that they have grasped that lesson. TECs are the best we have and that is why we have tabled an amendment to improve them and give them more money.

When the Labour party returns to power, which we hope will not be too long, we shall hve to provide radical solutions to revive the skills. The Conservative Government left a mess over training for us to deal with the last time we came to power. We must support TECs, which are being short-changed. I am sure that the managers and directors who came forward to help the Government feel that they have been kicked in the teeth. They were the better managers from the more progressive companies.

The ones who do not give a damn will never be caught sitting on the boards. They might be seen at the Rotary club, or somewhere like that, complaining about the standard of education that their children are getting, but they will not be among the school managers or on the TEC boards. Those people who have come forward have been kicked in the teeth and not been given the necessary money. They know that, and the Government know it. This provision provides a stop-gap solution to a long-term problem, and I hope that hon. Members will support the amendment.

Mr. Lilley: Perhaps with your compliance, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I may wind up this debate by treating it as a discussion on the amendments and the clause stand part combined, by summarising the background to TECs and responding to some of the arguments that have been raised since I previously detained the House with my thoughts.

TECs are a major new initiative designed to promote local participation in training and enterprise activities. They are private companies with boards consisting mainly of local business, and will work under contract to the Department of Employment's Training Agency. The first TECs signed contracts in April 1990. Much of the TECs' activity will cover existing Government training programmes, such as youth training, but there will also be a discretionary local initiative fund that TECs can spend on projects of their own choice to promote training or local enterprise activities.

The first 12 TECs signed contracts in April 1990, and a further 70 are at various stages of development. It is expected that over the next year, a national network of TECs will be established. TECs will work in conjunction with local enterprise agencies, where those already exist.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Has my hon. Friend noted that one of the TECs that has been given permission under this scheme is one covering my constituency and the region of Kingston and Elmbridge? The measure before us has been welcomed by businesses in that area because it should enable them to give additional help to the TEC's training programmes that are being set up.

Mr. Lilley: I am happy to recognise that, and I am sure that it reflects the interests of the local Member. I am also happy that Hertfordshire is another area in which TECs have been established, and there are a number of others that have already made good progress.

In the absence of the special relief that the clause introduces, some TECs might have sought charitable status so that businesses could obtain tax relief on donations under existing legislation. However, not all the TECs' activities would qualify as charitable. In general, training activities could be regarded as charitable, but certain enterprise activities would not, and TECs would need to divide their activities and functions to ensure that charitable status could be obtained for the relevant part of their work, which would involve increased administrative burdens on the TECs. Hence our decision to introduce the clause.

Overall, the Government are spending £2·5 billion a year on training programmes, and the value of tax relief on companies spending must be at least as much again. The main responsibility for training must lie with employers, who need to invest in their work force. That is a message which we cannot emphasise too much. It is employers, not Government, who are best placed to judge the skills needed in their business, and to organise training accordingly. Happily, the evidence proves that that is precisely what they are increasingly doing.

The 1989 labour force survey, published on 9 March, showed that the number of employees receiving training increased by more than 70 per cent. in the five years up to 1989. Employers in both private and public sectors have been investing £20 billion a year in training.

Mr. Martlew: How does the Minister get these statistics? Are they collected in forms that land on the desks of personnel managers, who then just fill them in? If so, his jubilation is misplaced.

Mr. Lilley: The figure that I gave—£20 billion—was based on a Department of Employment publication of last year, which in turn was based on a survey originally carried out in 1986-87. It estimated the total costs of training borne by public and private employers. It was a one-off survey and a fairly significant one, which is why it is not repeated every year. The estimate has been updated modestly to allow for a little inflation; the actual sum could now be more than £20 billion.

It is important to recognise that companies are now spending more—a fact which should be welcomed. Such spending is a duty of companies; and it is in their interests —that is why they are spending more. They do not do it, by and large, out of altruism. However, they can spend the money because they are now profitable. There were a number of reasons that led to the inadequacies of private provision for training, one of which was that, for a long time, industries, profits were simply not sufficient. As profits have recovered, so has spending on training.

The hon. Member for Derby, South mentioned our frequent and pleasurable exchanges on the subject of spending. I must disappoint her by saying that I enjoy them so much that I intend them to continue. The fact is that she has advocated spending more, and her hon. Friends have done so even more emphatically. She referred to the debate on public expenditure earlier this year when she claimed that her spending bids were offset by her proposals for cuts. I read the debate afterwards because I was not quite sure whether I had missed something.

It seemed to me from the text of Hansard that most of the spending cuts that she was proposing were to do with the cost of achieving privatisations. I do not agree that those amount to cuts, because if the Government were not carrying out privatisations they would lose all the revenues

Mrs. Beckett: It looks as if I had better read the debate too, but I did talk about the way in which the Government have wasted money, particularly on marketing privatisations. From memory, the sort of areas that I had in mind were, for example, what the Government call the 2 per cent. incentive on personal pensions and what we call the 2 per cent. bribe; the granting of tax relief on health insurance; and so on.

Mr. Lilley: Not much would have been gained from the hon. Lady's latter point. If she is proposing more spending in the current year, which can be accommodated in the current public expenditure round, she will have to go through the same painful processes as my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury and propose more cuts. We look forward with interest to what she has to offer. Otherwise, I suppose that we can only assume that she is following the old dictum that more means less.

The hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) said that the chair, as she referred to him, of the Blackburn TEC had threatened to resign. I understand that there has been no threat of resignation. Blackburn TEC is still negotiating its first budget, and as it is its first budget it cannot yet have been cut.

I listened to the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes)—he is very much the Labour party's answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow), and I listened to him with almost as much pleasure as I do to my hon. Friend—and found everything that he said beyond criticism, except in one respect: he described me as young. I regret that that is no longer so.

The hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) made an interesting speech in which he referred to the old apprenticeship scheme. There is a lot of regret about its disappearance over the years, but it is worth considering why it disappeared. One reason was the pressure on profitability, which was of two sorts—the overall lack of profitability of British industry, and the increasing insistence on adult wages for those undergoing training. That is in marked contrast to the experience in most continental countries in which there has been a far greater differential between the pay of those undergoing training and of those who are trained and on adult wages. So we were moving in the opposite direction, with the obvious consequences.

Mr. Martlew: I would not disagree with what the Minister has said. The old apprenticeship scheme needed changing from a time-served basis to a skill basis. The fact that the wages of apprentices became nearer those of skilled workers was the fault of weak management in British industry at the time.

Mr. Lilley: I am quite prepared to agree with the hon. Gentleman. I hope that industry is listening and will respond to our consensus of wisdom. None the less, we have to replace what has passed, and that is what the Government have been doing in the major programmes that they have announced.

I commend the clause to the House. I believe that it provides a useful change to the legislation; it will allow a relief for altruistic contributions to TEC and LECs. We understand the reasons for the amendment. We have no disagreement in principle or substance, but we believe that the amendment would prove onerous if it were agreed to, so I shall be asking my hon. Friends to oppose it, albeit in a fairly friendly spirit.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Clause 68, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 9

REGISTRATION

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Clause 9 simplifies the procedures by which businesses determine whether they must register for VAT.

I must begin by taking slight issue with the notes on clauses issued by the Treasury, which are intended to simplify and to explain clauses. It was with some surprise and concern that I came across the following note on clause 9:

"Sub-paragraph 1(1) provides reference to the new sub-paragraphs (3) to (5) and continues to cite the revised sub-paragraph 1(a). The revised sub-paragraph 1(1)(a) replaces the current sub-paragraphs 1(1)(a) (i) and (ii)".

That is impenetrable and does not enlighten our consideration of the clause. I hope that in future the notes on clauses will be clearer than the clause, not less clear.

Clause 9 has already been welcomed by many small traders, and we intend to support it. There has long been discontent that the tests to determine whether a small trader should register for VAT were too complex. Even before the new regime for VAT penalties and interest which has just been introduced, the cost of not registering when one should have done so could have been punitive, and that has become more so with the recent new system of penalties.

Before the changes proposed in clause 9, a trader had to apply four different tests in order to see whether he should register. The first was a test of the past year's turnover exceeding a specified threshold; the second was a test of the past quarter's turnover exceeding another specified threshold; the third a test of the next month's anticipated turnover being likely to exceed a third threshold; and the fourth a test of the next year's turnover being likely to exceed a fourth threshold. Those four tests all had to be undertaken regularly by a small business in order to ascertain whether it should register. It was a complex bureaucratic procedure, which was resented by many small businesses.

Clause 9 effectively removes two of those tests—the test of the past quarter's turnover and the test of the next year's turnover. The removal of those two tests is welcome, but I have two questions for the Economic Secretary. First, it appears from the clause that a trader must register at the end of a month if the previous year's turnover exceeded £25,400. In other words, the trader has to make an assessment on a rolling 12-month basis with a new assessment having to be made each month about whether the two remaining tests will be exceeded. That is somewhat onerous and I hope that, in a spirit of bipartisanship, the Government will consider some change, perhaps to a calendar quarter rather than the existing calendar month with the rolling provision.

Secondly, the increase in the threshold that the Government are introducing in the clause is an increase from £23,600 to £25,400—an increase of 7·6 per cent. Under the European Community sixth directive, the increase must be limited to a rise in real terms—that is, allowing for inflation. However, I am sure that the Government will be aware that inflation is currently running at considerably more than 7·6 per cent. It would be useful to know from the Government whether it might be possible to allow a slightly greater increase in the VAT threshold in the light of the rising level of inflation that we faced at the time of the Budget and that we certainly face now.

I raise those two small points, but in broad terms we support the general thrust of clause 9 and wish to see it included in the Bill.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): I welcome clause 9 because it considerably simplifies the arrangements for the registration of VAT traders. We have had VAT now for about 20 years, and ever since it was introduced the registration requirements have caused difficulties for small businesses. Small businesses are inevitably affected, because the threshold is so low.

There was no great problem until 1985, when the new Keith-type default provisions were introduced. Since then, a number of cases have been decided which many felt were penal in their outcome. Therefore, clause 9 is good news and I congratulate Treasury Ministers on it. It is obviously always difficult to anticipate turnover, and it makes so much more sense to have a registration requirement based on turnover recorded in the books of a business.

I have seen the representations made by the Institute of Taxation, to which I think the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) referred, which suggested that, despite a simplification, there was an increase in the compliance burden, because a business would have to look at its turnover at the end of each month rather than at the end of each quarter under the previous arrangement.

I always think that small businesses are ambivalent about VAT. They complain about the compliance burden that VAT imposes, but I was interested to note that, when annual VAT accounting was introduced a couple of years ago to lessen the burden on small businesses, take-up was low. I believe that one reason is that small businesses find the obligation to complete a VAT return once every quarter a useful discipline. They are usually busy trying to make a success of themselves and do not keep their books much up-to-date. However, every quarter they are compelled to bring their books up to date by the end of the following month, for the purpose of completing their VAT return. That is probably why take-up of monthly VAT accounting has been less than anticipated.

I have read the views of the Institute of Taxation, but I imagine that a small and growing business would want to know fairly soon after the end of any particular month what its turnover was in the preceding four weeks. That is not a difficult figure to calculate. Although I have some sympathy with the suggestion that, in subsection (2)(1)(a), the word "month" should be replaced by the word "quarter", the new obligation is not terribly onerous. Clause 9 offers a valuable simplification for small businesses that has already been widely welcomed.

Mr. Beith: I welcome the improvement that clause 9 represents. We should not get too excited when we remember that these days the VAT registration limit is such that any small business employing two people and paying some rent is likely to be over the threshold anyway. Therefore, we are taking only about the smallest businesses, to which monthly VAT accounting would be of advantage in many cases. It will allow some to remain free even of the threat of the requirement to register and offer them more peace of mind. Nevertheless, the complex problems of VAT, as they relate to other aspects such as bad debts, to which we shall return later, remain for a large number of other businesses. For a few, the clause will be most helpful.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I first declare an interest as parliamentary adviser to the Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales. I hope that the submissions that the institute lodged with the Treasury will prove helpful, not only to the Committee of the whole House but when right hon. and hon. Members repair to the Standing Committee later this week.

There are three technical questions that I want to put to my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary, but first I echo the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who congratulated Treasury Ministers on simplifying the registration procedure, which will be warmly welcomed by small businesses. My only gripe was that raised also by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield and by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith): that monthly accounting could prove onerous for some businesses and that a quarterly calculation might be fairer.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield put his finger on the button when he argued that, as a result of hardware that was not available even four or five years ago, small businesses can calculate their monthly turnover. If they do not do so, their bank would probably be extremely interested.

The institute suggests that, as a counterweight to the requirement placed on small businesses to monitor turnover monthly, the time limit for notifying a liability to register might be extended to two or three months. That would seem a fair bargain.

I turn now to my three technical points. I suggest that if the words

"in the period then ending not exceeding one year" was substituted for the words

"in the period of one year then ending"

in subsection (1)(1)(a), that would make it clear that the period does not have to be a full year. The existing words suggest that a full year must be taken into account, and I am not sure that that is what is intended.

Secondly, I know some chartered accountants who would like confirmation that the word "business" in subsection (1)(2) includes part of a business, to align with the wording that appears in article 12(1)(b) in the Value Added Tax (Special Provisions) Order 1981.

Finally, it is not clear, having regard to section 33 (1)(a) of the Valued Added Tax Act 1983 whether the words "his taxable supplies" in subsection (2)(a) refer to the transferee or include the supplies of the transferor now transferred to the transferee.

I acknowledge that these purely technical points may be extremely boring to the Committee, but they are important. I shall be happy if my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will write to me about them.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): In common with right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House, I believe that clause 9 is to be welcomed. I hope that it sets a precedent in establishing cross-party agreement on such matters, and that when my right hon. and hon. Friends present new clauses that are equally reasonable, they will similarly receive a fair hearing from Government Members. I understand from right hon. and hon. Members who served on previous Committees that that has not always been the case, but I am sure that open-minded Members of the Government Front Bench will want to prove their good will at an early point in the Committee proceedings, by accepting reasoned and reasonable amendments.

In the past, businesses had to check their turnover on a quarterly and full-year basis, and guess at their possible future turnover, to establish whether they needed to register for VAT. The new system will provide for registration only if the turnover threshold was achieved in the previous 12 months, which is a helpful and useful improvement.

The old system was extremely complicated, so any change that simplifies it must be welcomed. I hope that the Government will consider extending the principle to other areas—such as to people trying to complete housing benefit forms, which are also very complicated. Disposing of red tape in respect of small businesses will always have the support of my right hon. and hon. Friends. Equally, I hope that there will be support for simplifying the forms that must be completed for the purpose of poll tax rebates. I am sure that right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House have received letters from their constituents complaining about the complicated procedure that must be observed to obtain a rebate. I hope that clause 9 sets a precedent in simplifying procedures in that respect.

Small busineses constitute a vociferous local lobby, and rightly so. However, if one asks them for a list of the provisions in the Finance Bill that should be reconsidered, the imposition and complexities of VAT would probably come fairly low down on it. Other matters need to be examined in some detail, particularly interest rates. Certainly the chamber of commerce and small business organisations in my constituency have made endless representations to me—and I have no doubt to the Government and the Treasury—regarding the effect on their businesses of high interest rates and the uncertainty about whether the rates will go higher.

The one-club policy that the Government are adopting over interest rates is not merely a club but a sledge-hammer, and an ineffective one at that. The Government should show more diversity and flexibility in their policies for dealing with the present state of the economy. High interest rates alone are not the answer—they need to be part of a more comprehensive attack on inflation and the other problems that beset us, and which particularly beset small business people. They would benefit from an attack on high interest rates and the continued development of some of the things that hon. Members mentioned earlier, such as training to ensure that the skill levels in our communities guarantee higher levels of employment and income so that small businesses can continue to grow and flourish.

6.30 pm

If asked to list their priorities, while small business people would welcome clarification and simplification of VAT registration, they would probably put it fairly low on the list compared with other issues that we need to consider. In Committee those other issues will be important. Small business people will make representations in Committee and, among other things, they will concentrate on the economic indicators, which show the stagnant output that undoubtedly afflicts our economy, and the need to drive the economy back towards growth with sensible rather than obsessive and dogmatic policies on interest rates.

Small businesses have also been particularly affected by the uniform business rate. It would be remiss of us to discuss the clause without putting on record what UBR has meant to many small businesses. The Inland Revenue estimates that 252,000 businesses will face increases in bills. They are small businesses. While clarifying VAT for small businesses, surely we should consider all the other things that afflict them and VAT may not——

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. The hon. Gentleman is going rather wide of the subject. We may discuss some of these issues at a later date, but at present we should be discussing whether clause 9 should stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Allen: The last thing that I wish to do is to get on the wrong side of you at this early juncture, Mr. Lofthouse. Unfortunately that may happen later—who knows? In view of your comments, I shall conclude my remarks.

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): I am sure that all hon. Members present will be disappointed to learn that I shall not be serving on the Standing Committee this year as I have already sat for 270 hours in Committee on the King's Cross Bill—in which the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has some interest. I have enjoyed Committees enough this year and should allow others, such as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), the privilege of enjoying the Finance Bill Committee.

Mr. Beith: Who is to assist me in scourging the Government over retrospective legislation, on which the hon. Gentleman had such a distinguished record on previous Committees?

Mr. Hamilton: I recall the fight that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and I had last year on the Standing Committee to support what I believed to be the true Conservative principles in respect of retrospective legislation. I regret to say that even all the eloquence at his command, in addition to the few small words that fell from my lips, was not sufficient to persuade the Government of the merits of our cause. Virtually every week we had cause to join forces on the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service and I hope that that will suffice in the hon. Gentleman's mind to sustain the alliance which we have held together across the Floor, which was perhaps in rather better shape than the alliance he had with his own colleagues.

I welcome clause 9, because it increases the certainty of rules for the trader in an ingenious way and increases the effective level of registration threshold within the constraints of European Community legislation.

One of the complaints of small businesses, as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North said, has been the onerous burden of VAT compliance over the years. Until 1984 or 1985, I recall that the annual report of Customs and Excise used to contain a useful table which revealed the yield of VAT from traders within different bands of turnover threshold. I cannot recall the figures exactly, but the overwhelming bulk of VAT receipts come not from small businesses but from relatively large businesses, although the majority of registered traders are small businesses. Therefore, it is an expensive way to collect revenue, and the expense falls not on the public departments, but on small businesses who are responsible by and large, for administration of the tax. It is a great shame that that table is no longer published. I do not know whether it caused too much embarrassment and therefore had to be removed, but I should like to see it published once again.

Although I know that the arguments against raising the threshold too much are that it introduces inequities in competition between businesses, in particular when the VAT rate is 15 per cent., as it is in this country, we should have regard to the compliance costs of such a tax on small businesses. I am pleased that the Government have borne that in mind over the years and have made a number of useful reforms—perhaps this is one of them.

The clause demonstrates once again that the maximum registration threshold permitted by the European Community under the sixth directive is unrealistically low. It is a great shame that we are constrained in such a way. I am certain that if we had complete freedom of action on the matter we would not choose to have such a low VAT threshold. It amazes me that we have been unable to persuade our partners in the European Community of the rightness of our arguments in favour of raising the threshold significantly. One mystifying aspect of the European Community is that so many sensible ideas put forward by the Government are not accepted by our colleagues across the water.

The large increase in the compliance burden alluded to by my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), following the Keith report recommendations—now enshrined in legislation—and the risk that small businesses will incur penalties, make it all the more urgent for the Government to reopen in Brussels the question of a substantially increased threshold. It is not fair to expect the smallest businesses to have the same sort of resources available to understand and administer complex legislation as larger firms, which can afford to maintain their own in-house accounts and tax administrators. Consequently, it would be a great misfortune if the issue of the VAT threshold were to decline in importance over the years.

I hope that the Economic Secretary will redouble his efforts to raise the VAT threshold or to persuade our EC partners to support our campaign to raise it. That will lift a significant burden in administration and costs from businesses that are ill-equipped to carry the costs, particularly when other costs have been rising recently, as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North pointed out in his somewhat wide-ranging and discursive remarks on the community charge. I welcome the clause, and I shall support it if there is a Division.

Mr. Haynes: I remember the last exchanges with the Economic Secretary to the Treasury. We were talking about the good old British banger. They tried to take that away from us at the other end of the building. However, we got in first.

The hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) referred to the need for small businesses to show discipline. You and I, Mr. Lofthouse, knows what discipline means. We worked in the bowels of the earth. Discipline was all about saving life and limb. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield knows that there are many small businesses in my constituency. My constituents come to see me about their financial problems, some of which are the direct result of measures introduced by this Government.

One of my constituents with a fairly small business employed an accountant. I employ an accountant; I am no financial wizard. My constituent was in serious difficulty over VAT. He was told by the Inland Revenue that he was in deep trouble, so he came to my surgery and asked for help. I told him that I was no financial wizard and that I could not work it out for him but that I would write to Sir Lawrence Airey, who was the chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue at that time. We found out that the accountant had not done his job and that therefore his business owed the Inland Revenue £6,000 in VAT.

Shortly afterwards, Sir Lawrence Airey was summoned before the Select Committee on the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration to give evidence. I am a member of the Select Committee, so I had a word with him after the meeting. It turned out that although the accountant had not done his job properly, my constituent had been overcharged for VAT, so he got some of his money back. My constituent told me that he had always voted Conservative but that because he had got some of his money back he had decided to vote for me at the next election.

Local people who have left the pits have set themselves up in small businesses with their redundancy money. They are screaming like hell back home about the way this Government are taxing small businesses. They are hitting small firms hard and VAT involves them in more and more work. I agree with the hon. Member for Beaconsfield that self-discipline is needed—that small business men ought to do their books regularly and not wait until the end of the year to sort it all out. The Government must not, however, clobber the small business man. The Prime Minister told us a long time ago that small businesses create jobs and that small businesses ought to be encouraged. However, the Government must be fairer when it comes to taxing them. I appeal to the Government to help them. Small businesses make a valuable contribution to the economy.

Mr. Tim Smith: The hon. Gentleman says that the VAT burden is far greater now than it was 10 years ago. Will he, however, remind the Committee of the number of boxes that the registered trader had to fill in on his VAT return 10 years ago and how many he has to fill in today?

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Gentleman referred earlier to discipline; now he talks about burdens. I remember the time when the Chancellor of the Exchequer came to the House and said that he intended to double VAT. The hon. Gentleman has forgotten that; he was not here at the time. The hon. Gentleman talks about burdens, but it is the Government who have imposed burdens on small businesses. That is why my constituents come squealing to my surgery. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer doubled VAT it caused more and more work for small business people. They are sick of it.

In the case of some small businesses, the men still work in the pits. There are only three pits left in my constituency. The wife looks after the small business. They have to get their heads together to work out the VAT and to fill in all the flipping forms that this Government have imposed on them so that they can get in all their money. These poor souls have been down the pit all day. You know what it is like, Mr. Lofthouse, to be down the pit for eight hours a day.

The Temporary Chairman: Order. I am fully aware of the conditions in the pits. I am also fully aware of the contents of clause 9. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will stick to it.

Mr. Haynes: I am talking about small businesses. I hope that you are listening, Mr. Lofthouse.

The Temporary Chairman: The hon. Gentleman is going pretty wide of the clause.

Mr. Haynes: I do not think so, but I do not intend to have an argument with you.

The Temporary Chairman: Order. I happen to think so.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): I am enjoying the hon. Gentleman's speech so much that I almost hate to do this, but does he have any views on the commendable relaxation and simplification of the VAT rules that the clause introduces?

Mr. Haynes: I welcome that change. However, the Government have imposed a great burden on small businesses. The hon. Member for Beaconsfield then dragged me into debating the burden on small businesses. The VAT burden on small businesses is being increased by the Government.

Mr. Hanley: Does the hon. Gentleman know how many miners in his constituency who work eight hours a day down the pit then come out of the pit and do a part-time job with a turnover in excess of £25,000?

Mr. Haynes: Would I be in order if I answered that question, Mr. Lofthouse?

The Temporary Chairman: The hon. Gentleman can answer the question.

Mr. Haynes: I had to ask because I did not know whether you would step in and rule me out of order if I tried to answer it.

I am in the House five days a week so how can I keep track of everyone? What a stupid question. The matter is not funny. However, I think that I have said enough.

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Richard Ryder): The hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) and I have been a powerful force in defence of the British banger. I am happy to say that, although there may be a mad cow disease, as yet there is no mad pig disease—not even among the Gadarene swine. If one did develop, perhaps the hon. Member for Ashfield and I should get together again to save the British banger. Millions of people are grateful to the hon. Gentleman and me for ensuring that it is still on our plates.

Mr. Haynes: Is the Minister aware that the hon. Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) has just walked into the Chamber and that he, like us, thinks that the British banger is the best in the world?

The Temporary Chairman: The British banger is certainly enjoyable, but it has nothing to do with clause 9.

Mr. Ryder: I thank the hon. Member for Ashfield for reminding me that my hon. Friend the Member for Crawley (Mr. Soames) enjoys the British banger. However, as my hon. Friend has just walked into the Chamber, I did not need the reminder.

Let me reassure the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen)—who is a member of the Standing Committee on the Finance Bill—that he will find me an open-minded, cordial, friendly, helpful and co-operative Minister who is prepared to examine every conceivable point of view that is put to me. If the hon. Gentleman would like to draw to my attention any VAT forms that he thinks require further simplification, I shall be happy to examine them.

Mr. Allen: I thank the Minister for showing his usual generosity. I guarantee him that I will correspond with him within a fortnight with my suggestions, should I find that any amendments to VAT forms are necessary.

Mr. Ryder: I thank the hon. Gentleman.

All the speakers in this short debate have welcomed the general point made in clause 9. The measures for small and medium-sized businesses were central to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's Budget, and lie at the heart of the Bill. The revenue cost of the clause, which has been welcomed by the small business community, is about £75 million.

Clauses 9 and 10 may not grab the headlines, but together they provide for nearly a quarter of a billion in legislative assistance for the small business community. They are deliberately targeted at smaller, growing businesses, which—although perhaps less glamorous—are none the less important. Such companies produce a large proportion of our industrial output, and have grown apace during the past few years.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) made some observations about the notes on clauses. I will do my best to ensure that they are made clearer than the notes for clause 9. I am only too grateful to the hon. Gentleman for not asking me to explain the notes on clauses, as I would not have been able to do so. Clause 9 was welcomed by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) and my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton)—I am sorry that he is not a member of the Standing Committee this year.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury asked about the liability arising at the end of a calendar quarter, for example, rather than at the end of a month. The month-end determination of liability reduces unfair competition from traders who remain unregistered. It also minimises the revenue loss, and maintains an even flow of registration work for Customs. Most businesses keep monthly records of sales and expenses in any event.

The hon. Gentleman was also concerned about the possibility of raising the threshold still further—an argument also pursued by my hon. Friend the Member for Tatton. The original threshold of £5,000 has been increased over the years—in line with inflation—to the present level of £25,400, which is already among the highest in the EEC. A further increase would constitute a breach of our legal obligation under article 24 of the sixth VAT directive, to which my hon. Friend referred.

However, I agree with my hon. Friend's general observations about the threshold, and it is inconceivable that his views will not be put strongly by Ministers whenever suitable opportunities arise in Brussels. As he knows, we want to ensure that the threshold is raised still further, although some industries—such as the building industry—would like it to be lowered. It is not a uniform pattern across small businesses.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Economic Secretary rightly says that the European Commission insists that the rise in the threshold should be no greater than inflation. However, which inflation figure does he mean? Does he mean the inflation figure at the date of the Chancellor's Budget, or an average inflation figure taken over a period of 12 months? If so, which 12 months? The figure used in the calculation relating to clause 9 is 7·6 per cent., but inflation is currently at 9·4 per cent. and rising. Which figure will be used?

Mr. Ryder: When the threshold has been raised over the years, it has not always been raised directly in relation to inflation. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury would be pursuing the wrong hare if he believed that it had been. If the threshold were raised, that would require another significant loss of revenue, and would further increase the distortion of the balance between registered and unregistered traders.

As an accountant, my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes raised three technical points. As he requests, I shall write to him about them as soon as possible, as I, too, would like to clarify the matter.

This has been a valuable debate. It has shown that the House fully supports clause 9 and the important measures that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has taken to help small businesses. I hope that the House will continue to support the Bill.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Smith: Clause 10 relates to bad debt relief for VAT. It will cost the Exchequer £150 million in a full year, so we are talking about a substantial measure and it is important to ensure that the Government have got it right. We broadly welcome the Government's aim in the clause but do not think they have it right, and we have tabled amendments to improve it. I hope that when he returns to his place, the Economic Secretary will address the issues involved in the clause in the open-minded manner that he promised he would adopt in our discussions on the Bill.

The Government have made much of the claim that the clause will ease the position of VAT recovery for small businesses. Our fear is that there are some limited circumstances in which the clause will make matters worse, and we have tabled amendments to correct that problem. I shall return to that issue later as I deal in detail with our amendments. It is important at the outset to recognise the context in which the debate is taking place, and to that end it is necessary to examine the overall context in which small businesses find themselves.

Small, if useful, measures on VAT registration and bad debt relief are as nothing beside the two overwhelming and dominating facts of life for small businesses in Britain today. Those are high interest rates and the introduction of the uniform business rate.

High interest rates have been adopted by the Government as the only policy that is supposed to operate as a deterrent to demand and credit in the British economy. As we know, high interest rates are not particularly good instruments as a deterrent to demand. As we pointed out on Second Reading, since the former Chancellor began to tighten credit by raising the cost of money, £150 billion-worth of additional credit has gone into the domestic economy. The profit figures announced this morning by Sainsbury show that the impact on the demand side of the economy has been imperfect at best.

But the problem with high interest rates is that they harm the supply side of the equation, too. It becomes crucial for small businesses because of the results of the harm on the supply side. Large-scale business tends to invest out of its own profits. Small business must borrow to invest, to grow and to take the decisions about future expansion that must be taken.

The reality is clear. For example, the chairman of the Midland bank, Sir Kit McMahon, was reported on 24 April last to have said:

"High interest rates were hitting businesses as well as individuals and leading to a worsening of the bank's bad debts."

That was a clear indication from the Midland bank, echoed a couple of days later by the deputy chairman of Barclays bank, that small businesses throughout the country were facing enormous difficulty as a result of the Government's high interest rate policy.

The accountants Peat, Marwick, McLintock reported a 27 per cent. rise in the number of companies going into voluntary liquidation in the first quarter of this year. That is the background for small businesses against which we come to this debate about VAT changes for small businesses.

At the same time as high interest rates are operating on small businesses, the uniform business rate is having a great impact, especially in the south of the country, on the small-scale retailing sector. Even the transitional protection that the Government have supposedly introduced will not make life much better for small businesses faced with the certainty of major increases in the rates that they will pay in each of the next five years.

We must consider clause 10 against that background. Likewise, we must consider the changes that our amendments would make to the clause. There are two forms of trader who are not affected by clause 10. A limited number of traders use either the cash accounting scheme or the retailers' standard method scheme. Under either of those, output VAT is accounted for only when cash is received. So bad debt relief is automatic for firms in those categories.

All other traders will find the clause important. For them, VAT must at present be accounted for to Customs on the basis of VAT invoices issued, regardless of whether the money has been received. As a result, if a trader charges a customer £100 of VAT, he must at the time of his next VAT return account for that £100 to Customs and Excise, whether or not he has received the money.

If the £100 is not received, because the customer defaults, how can the trader get his £100 back or have it recredited? Until the date of the Budget, he could get it back only if the debtor became formally insolvent, and the formal definition of insolvency—generally either bankruptcy or liquidation—was set out in section 22 of the Value Added Tax Act 1983.

If a debtor simply did not pay or became untraceable —if he disappeared or, in the case of large companies, the debt was small—it was not worthwhile tracking the debtor down, making him bankrupt and petitioning for a company's liquidation. As a result, even where a debt had been written off and was clearly not recoverable, VAT bad debt relief was often not available. As larger debtors were chased and as larger creditors tended to pursue debts as a matter of principle, the problem tended to affect mainly relatively small debts owed to small and medium-sized traders.

Overall, taken in total, a substantial amount of money is involved and it has been a source of great irritation to many businesses. For example, in the credit card operation of one major high street retailer, in 1988-89 £12 million of small debts, of under £500 each, was written off. By doing that, the company would have lost some £1·8 million in VAT bad debt relief. So in some instances we are talking about substantial sums of money and a substantial impact upon the cash flow of companies.

The new relief which clause 10 introduces allows the £100 of VAT to be reclaimed or recredited after three things have happened. First, the VAT has to have been paid over by the trader to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise before it can subsequently be reclaimed under the provisions of the clause. Secondly, the debt has to be written off in the company's accounts, and thirdly—the point to which our principal amendment relates—at least two years must elapse from the date of the supply.

Representative bodies of small businesses have been pressing for such bad debt relief for many years, so it is a welcome change. However, the pressure was for such a change to be made as an alternative to the existing system, not as a complete and total replacement for it. Our other main amendment seeks to enshrine that principle so that after Royal Assent the new clause 10 provisions are not a total replacement for the existing provisions, and to allow them to run side by side.

Mr. Tim Smith: I do not fully understand one aspect of the hon. Gentleman's argument. I do not understand why it is thought that clause 10 is so important for small businesses. Any small business with a turnover of less than £250,000, which is not that much, can opt for cash accounting. If a company opts for cash accounting it has to account for output only when it receives the cash. Small businesses do not have to worry about all that, so why is the clause so important for small businesses if they can opt for cash accounting?

Mr. Chris Smith: I am surprised by the hon. Gentleman, who is normally somewhat more perceptive. Of course the clause is important to small businesses, as it is to larger businesses, but larger businesses can frequently tolerate greater ups and downs in their cash flow than can small businesses which have not opted for cash accounting. I made it clear at the beginning of my remarks that the cash accounting principle was excluded from the provisions for bad debt relief because VAT is not claimed at the point of supply. The hon. Gentleman must realise that large numbers of small businesses are affected by the provisions of clause 10 for whom the deficiencies of clause 10 are likely to be important.

The new relief will be introduced in place of the old relief and schedule 16 of the Bill, which no doubt we shall be discussing in some weeks' time, repeals section 22 of the Value Added Tax Act 1983.

The problem is that, where prompt relief might have been possible under the old system, it is likely to be delayed under the new system. Let me illustrate that. If a major trader, which we shall call Ryder and Co., is rendering quarterly VAT returns and in July 1990 Ryder and Co. sells goods to another company—let us call it Lilley and Co.—for £1 million plus VAT of £150,000. Payment is due in 60 days. At the end of September 1990, Ryder and Co. pays the £150,000 to Her Majesty's Customs and Excise. Lilley and Co. has not yet paid Ryder and Co.

In October, Ryder presses Lilley for payment and hears that Lilley may be insolvent. In November Ryder petitions for Lilley's liquidation and in December Ryder submits proof to the liquidator who responds that the company is likely to receive £230,000 in due course. Ryder therefore writes off £920,000 in its year-end accounts and with December 1990 VAT return claims repayment of £120,000. Effectively, under the existing system of claim back the repayment would have taken only one VAT quarter. In practice that would be unusually quick, but not totally uncommon.

Under the new system, Ryder and Co. would have to wait until at least July 1992—two years after the supply and seven VAT quarters after paying over the VAT—before being able to recover the £120,000 from Customs and Excise. Potentially that could be a crippling blow, because a further £800,000 would already have been lost as a result of the non-payment. At an estimated 15 per cent. cash flow cost, the cash flow cost to the company would be at least £18,000. It is therefore perfectly conceivable that under the changes that the Government have introduced, in some circumstances bad debt relief will be worse than under the existing system. In those circumstances the reforms in clause 10 could cost traders money. They would get additional relief for smaller bad debts, but would suffer delays in receiving relief for larger debts.

The amendments seek to relieve or eliminate the problem. Amendment No. 3 is our principal amendment and unless the Government can satisfy us on it, we might divide the Committee. The amendment seeks to reduce the two-year time limit in clause 10(1)(c) to one year. If it takes an average of nine months from the date of supply to obtain bad debt relief under the old system—the period that would normally apply if the debtor went into liquidation—and if a one-year rather than a two-year period were to operate, the new system would simply add three months' delay rather than the 15 months' delay that would apply under current proposals. The period of one year would be more appropriate and sensible. It would allow for 80 days of credit, five months of arguing—if discussions were appropriate—and six months to write off the debt.

Amendment No. 3 would provide that instead of having to wait two years before it can get bad debt relief, a company should have to wait only one year. That seems to provide a better framework for business without causing insuperable administrative problems for Customs and Excise.

Amendment No. 1 would reinstate the old section 22 test as an alternative to the time lapse test. As I said earlier, the amendment would set the old system for relief where liquidation took place alongside the new system, rather than allowing the new system totally to eradicate the old. If liquidation took place within a short period after the supply of goods or services, the old system operated fairly effectively. Under the Government's proposals the two-year time limit has to expire before relief can be obtained. Amendment No. 1 seeks to reinstate the old system to run in parallel with the new, and offers the two as alternatives to the business community.

Amendment No. 2 is slightly more technical; the Liberal Democrats have tabled a similar amendment, No. 37. Amendment No. 2 has two aims. First, under new Inland Revenue regulations, small traders can present simplified accounts to support a tax return and there is no statutory requirement to produce full accounts. Some small traders may not have accounts which would satisfy clause 10(1)(b). Their three-line accounts will not identify bad debts as part of the specific acccounts prepared by the company. The amendment requires only that the account be written off in the accounting records from which the accounts, however simple, have been or will be prepared. Even smaller traders will have such records, which are a VAT requirement.

The second reason for amendment No. 2 is that the wording of clause 10(1)(b) could in some circumstances cause problems. Let us assume that the Government were to decide that although our proposal for a 12-month period is not acceptable, none the less two years is too long, and in due course proposed shortening the period to 15 months. If a company had a debt of £1 million, with VAT of £150,000 already paid to Her Majesty's Customs. dating from March 1991, the debt would not be written off in the December 1991 acounts but would be written off in the May 1992 ledger. To satisfy the provisions of clause 10(1)(b), the company could not reclaim the VAT until the audited 1992 accounts were available, say, in April 1993.

In the amendment, we suggest that the proof that the debt was written off should not have to wait until the published accounts but should be demonstrable by entries in the company's ledgers, which would be used in the compilation of the accounts. That would mean that the company would not have to wait, possibly for several years, for the bad debt relief.

I wish to make three other brief points in respect of the clause. First, the power in clause 10(5)(g) to let the commissioners make regulations which appear to be drawn rather widely. Obviously, we wish to ensure that the commissioners have the powers they need, but the provisions of that part of the clause seem wide. Although regulations will be promulgated under the provision, we ask the Government to ensure that any such regulations are issued in draft for comment before promulgation takes place.

Secondly, clause 10(4)(a) is clearly aimed at the position where someone deliberately overcharges another person for a supply, crediting the VAT on the VAT return of the person receiving the supply, with the supplier then recovering it under the new rules. We wish to catch precisely such abuse as well. The wording of clause 10(4)(a)—

"equal to or less than its open market value"—

seems to be drawn extremely tightly. It is reminiscent of Shylock's pound of flesh when even £1 worth above the stated value would immediately disqualify the entire bad debt relief. That seems tough. We hope that the Government will consider a phrase such as, "the value of the supply not being substantially greater than the open market value".

Thirdly, I note that the Liberal Democrats have tabled amendment No. 38 in respect of clause 10(4)(b). There might be a problem with the provision where goods are sold under hire purchase or under a Romalpa clause, whereby in strict law title remains with the vendor until the goods are fully paid for, but where the goods are not recovered by the vendor when the purchaser defaults. Unless clause 10(4)(b) is withdrawn or amended, a strict interpretation would mean that bad debt relief would not be due in such cases. It would be useful to have an assurance that the regulations will allow relief to be claimed.

I have tried to outline on these complicated and technical matters the purpose of our amendments. We agree entirely with the aim upon which the Government have embarked in clause 10 to make life better and easier for businesses claiming bad debt relief. We do not think that the Government have got it entirely right. We have tabled the amendments in a spirit of helpfulness to the Government and in the hope that improvements will be made.

Sir Barney Hayhoe (Brentford and Isleworth): The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) was less than generous in his welcome to a worthwhile and overdue reform. It is no secret that sometimes Ministers, as a result of collective responsibility, have to support and take action on matters with which they are not in 100 per cent. agreement. That was certainly true for me in the mid-1980s when I was a Treasury Minister with responsibility for indirect taxation.

Having had a hand in the reform of bad debt provision in regard to insolvency, I always recognised that very hard cases still remained in which groups of traders were suffering, because at that time we were unable, with the expertise available to the Customs and Excise, to come up with a scheme as wide in operation as that now proposed.

I warmly congratulate my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary —who has, I imagine, dealt with the detail of the provisions—on bringing forward this reform. I can remember a number of times on which I had to write letters to traders who could not believe that the system was fair. I had to say to them that VAT operated on the supply of goods and services and not on the payment for them. It was bad enough when people defaulted on paying the fees or the charges for the goods or services supplied, but when the traders who were suffering from that bad debt had only limited redress through the insolvency provisions and often had no redress in reclaiming the VAT, one realised that the problem required Government action.

The Government have now moved substantially in that direction at a significant cost of between £150 million and £200 million in a full year. That is a substantial contribution by the Government towards putting right something that has been wrong for too long. This is an excellent provision in what I regard as a good, fair and responsible Budget. It is with great pleasure that I commend clause 10, although I have a little trace of regret that when I had Treasury responsibility, I was unable to take the helpful action that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor and my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary have now taken.

Mr. Beith: Clause 10 is a welcome feature of the Bill and addresses part of a major problem for smaller businesses. Bad debt is the tip of the iceberg of the problem of debt and late payment, which besets small business to such an extent that it has given rise to pleas for legislation and to private Members' Bills which have addressed the wider issue of late payment. Government Departments themselves are sometimes open to substantial criticism because many small businesses find it most difficult of all to deal with Government agencies.

There is also a case for the Government, perhaps through training programmes, through the training and enterprise councils and through help for small businesses to direct attention towards ways of stopping bad debt problems mounting up and to encourage new businesses to put invoice and collection systems properly in place from the beginning. In my experience, many good craftsmen and tradesmen are often slow to send in their bills, so they are slow to realise that bad debts will arise.

I am sometimes amazed by how long people who have done decent jobs wait to get paid and how often they fail to issue an initial invoice, let alone chase up the debt involved. That is often because such tradesmen are good at doing the job rather than good at the technicalities of chasing payment. However, there are so many relatively simple computer systems now that small business can be given every help and encouragement to stop the problem building up.

Clause 10 addresses the extreme end of the problem —genuine bad debt. In a wide-ranging speech, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) talked about the banks and their involvement. It struck me at the time that it is all very well for the banks to talk about bad debt when they have found that the worst bad debts are caused not by the expansion of demand in the retail trade, but in Third-world countries and in agriculture.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that there would not have been so many bad debts if the banks had not been such bad lenders?

Mr. Beith: The banks' readiness to lend in circumstances in which individuals should be much more cautious about the pressure put on people to borrow money has been part of the recent economic problems, although the record of recovery at the personal debt level is very much better than it is in some other areas. I singled out agriculture and debts in Third-world countries as areas where the banks have seriously overcommitted themselves far more, to their own detriment. In personal debt, they have caused considerable damage to individuals by encouraging them to take out debts that they cannot repay.

Sir Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Does the hon. Gentleman agree that by giving enormous advances to Third-world countries, which will never be repaid, the banks have made it almost impossible or far more difficult to lend to smaller businesses?

Mr. Beith: No, because the banks still have the capacity to provide loans to small businesses. I am critical of the way in which they carried out lending operations to Third-world countries, but we shall have plenty of opportunity to talk about that when we debate other provisions in the Bill.

I and my right hon. and hon. Friends have tabled amendments designed to improve clause 10. Amendment No. 37, which overlaps with amendment No. 2, seeks to delete the word "accounts" and to insert "books and records". It is worrying that, if full statutory accounts are required, it will be a long time before a business can make a claim for relief from VAT. It could be a process of two years to have audited accounts available and unless the word "accounts" is used in a looser and more general way, the clause could present a real obstacle and could leave small businesses wondering whether it will be worth the effort and time involved in following the matter through over so long a period. I hope that the Economic Secretary will tell us that the word "accounts" in this case does not mean final audited or statutory accounts.

Amendment No. 38 seeks to remove clause 10(4)(b) which denies relief where the goods have been supplied under a reservation of title, or what is known as a Romalpa title in the trade, in which the title remains with the vendor until payment is received. The logic is that the vendor can simply repossess the goods to meet his VAT payments and the debt to him, but that is not always easy. A hire purchase item may mysteriously disappear from the premises of the person who has incurred the debt. A piece of equipment may be supplied to another company which, strangely, has disappeared. Access to the premises may not be easily obtained. There are many reasons why repossession may not be feasible in the circumstances.

If the debt is treated as a bad debt, but the item is subsequently reclaimed or returns to the possession of the business, the value would come back via clause 10(5)(e) and would be repaid. There are provisions there to ensure that a bad debt that ceases to be a bad debt is not the subject of a double benefit. I hope that the Minister will either accept amendment No. 38 or find some other way to ensure that people trading in that manner can obtain VAT relief. We are dealing with a sector that is important not only in the retail hire purchase trade, but in small business generally.

Small businesses that face difficulties in obtaining capital are frequently involved in arrangements under which they have equipment whose title remains with the vendor until payment is received or completed. It is a common method and is an alternative to full-scale leasing which many small businesses use for the equipment they need. I look to the Minister to find a way of meeting those difficulties. If he does so, he will improve what is already a useful clause.

Mr. David Nicholson (Taunton): This is the first debate on a Finance Bill in which I have taken part which has been initiated by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), for whom I have some admiration. However, I am sorry that he spoke at some length and somewhat controversially in the early part of his speech. He spent so long in setting the scene that I hope, Mr. Lofthouse, that you will permit me to respond to his remarks on interest rates, for example. All hon. Members recognise that interest rates are a major problem for all kinds of businesses at present. However, let the House not forget that, under the previous Labour Government, the rate of interest was normally below the rate of inflation, so savers were losing all the time. It is appropriate to make that point in the debate on a Budget that aims to help saving.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury also referred to the uniform business rate as a source of burdens on small businesses. He will recall that we have previously debated the Labour party's attitude to the revaluation of business rating, which is by far the greatest cause of the burdens facing many businesses at the moment. The Labour party supports that revaluation.

We welcome the measure in clause 10 which, as has been stated, will cost between £150 million and £200 million. That is a substantial amount at a time when budgetary pressure is significant. I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. Certain business organisations share some of the reservations that have been expressed. I understand that the Confederation of British Industry has expressed reservations, although I have not been in direct contact with it. I believe that it has made representations to one or two of my hon. Friends.

I must declare an interest because I am an adviser to the Building Employers Confederation which, in collusion with the CBI, has expressed concern about the way in which the bad debt relief might work. The BEC does not want traders to have to wait two years for the relief to take effect. It also sees certain advantages in running the new system in parallel with the old so that there will be an alternative. I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury will address those concerns expressed by business organisations and consider further possible representations that they might make in writing after this debate.

Mr. Allen: It is worth noting that it was a Conservative Administration who raised VAT from 8 per cent. to 15 per cent. in their first year of office. We must view some of the problems that are related to clause 10 against that background and against a wider background of small businesses suffering the highest interest rates of any G7 country and the highest rate of inflation in industrialised Europe. I must make those points as we discuss what some people outside this place might consider a rather technical clause.

You were right, Mr. Lofthouse, to call me to order earlier when I referred to the uniform business rate. That also forms part of the background to this debate, in which we are considering small businesses that might be forced out of business. The registration requirement might be the final straw for them. Because of the wider factors to which I have referred, many small businesses will find that any additional impositions might be enough to force them over the brink. Dun and Bradstreet estimate that in 1989 bankruptcies were running at 26·3 per cent. in London and the south-east, while the figure was 9·3 per cent. for England as a whole. Those figures appeared in March 1990.

Mr. Hanley: Of what was that 9·3 per cent.?

Mr. Allen: Of 100 per cent.

We must also put the problem of late payments into perspective. My hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) paid tribute to his predecessor and I wanted to pay tribute to my predecessor, who was also a Conservative, Mr. Richard Ottaway. He often raised the issue of small claims and late payments. I am glad to see Conservative Back Benchers picking up on that campaign once again. I hope that they will find a ready response from the Government Front Bench.

Mr. Hanley: Will the hon. Gentleman consider the number of liquidations against the number of new companies being formed? If he did that, he would see that in all parts of the country the net number of new companies is higher than ever in our history.

Mr. Allen: We must be very careful about the number of companies and businesses that are being created. We must consider how long they last. The companies that become bankrupt or go out of business may be different companies from those that are being created. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) has just arrived in the Chamber hot foot from his constituency. I understand that he has lost 1,000 jobs in his constituency over the past couple of days. Frankly, even a dozen new hamburger stalls would not compensate to that loss of jobs.

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): I hope that we have not yet lost those jobs. Brymbo was one of the most profitable steelworks in the country. It takes genius on the part of the Government to lose those jobs.

Mr. Allen: All new business is welcome. However, we must ensure that the balance in our economy, which has been distorted over the past 10 years, reaches some equilibrium. We need full-time jobs that pay a reasonable rate for the job. People should not be forced into low-income employment to supplement otherwise inadequate earnings. Wives should not have to go out to work when they would rather look after young families at home when their husbands are at work.

I understand that the measure in clause 10 will cost about £150 million. I do not want the measure to be withdrawn and I do not say that £150 million should not be spent. However, I hope that we will refer to the measure constantly in our proceedings on this Bill as an illustration of where the Government's spending priorities lie. In an earlier debate, the Department of Employment's training programmes were cut by £212 million. Today the Prime Minister refuted the need for more resources to be devoted to tracking down sex offenders—something that is close to the hearts of some Opposition Members.

The Temporary Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman is straying. He should return to the amendment.

7.45 pm

Mr. Allen: I accept that reprimand, but I was trying to draw a perspective on the spending involved in clause 10. That spending amounts to £150 million. While I do not believe that that money will not be spent properly, there are other spending priorities, which should be examined thoroughly in our debates on this Bill.

Mr. Tim Smith: The hon. Gentleman is complaining about the cost of the measure. However, his hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) has already welcomed it. He is proposing an amendment to reduce the period to one year, and no doubt that would increase the costs a great deal. What does the hon. Gentleman say about that?

Mr. Allen: I am sorry that my arguments went over the hon. Gentleman's head. I will try to explain them more simply, so that he can understand them. We are used to his interventions in the Public Accounts Committee, where he is usually a little more perceptive.

We are entitled to examine the Government's spending priorities as a whole in the Finance Bill. I welcome the spending on this measure of VAT relief. I also welcome the speech of my hon. Friend the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. My point is that there are many other spending priorities, but you, Mr. Lofthouse, would draw me to order if I were to refer to them in detail. However, those other priorities should also be taken into account. They illustrate the philosophy of a Government who, in many aspects in the Budget, have decided to do very little. They are holding the ship as steady as possible while it is surrounded by icebergs. Nevertheless, other areas are involved and need to be examined.

The first of the three amendments explained by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury seeks to ensure that the baby is not thrown out with the bath water. Although we welcome clause 10, we should ensure that companies that are insolvent retain their current abilities and are not ruled out of the provisions.

The second of our group of amendments seeks to help with small traders' claims for relief. That point has been well covered. The final amendment in this group, on which I have no doubt that my hon. Friend the Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) wishes to comment, relates to the delay in claiming VAT relief on all written-off debts. Again, I hope that the Government will feel that it is possible to reduce the two years to one and that they will accept the amendment as proposed. If that is not possible, I hope that the Economic Secretary will at least agree to consider the matter in some detail and that he will make some verbal commitment when he replies.

Mr. Tim Smith: When VAT was first introduced, the position on bad debt relief was clear—there was no bad debt relief. It is important that the Committee understands how unfair that was. Value added tax was organised in such a way that a business had to pay over the VAT whether or not the registered trader had received the cash. If the trader never received the customer's cash, he never received the cash back from Customs and Excise. My right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe) was the Minister responsible for Customs and Excise at the time. He introduced what he has just conceded was a step in the right direction on the issue of bad debt relief, but it provided only for businesses that were already insolvent. There was therefore still a problem, because many businesses still had to pay VAT to Customs and Excise, but were unable to recover it.

It is important to understand that registered traders are effectively unpaid collectors of taxes. They are not dealing with their own liability; they are collecting a tax and paying it to Customs and Excise. It was a most unfair system, because they were required to pay a tax when somebody else was unable to pay it. The clause is welcome, as it introduces a comprehensive system of bad debt relief for the first time.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) does not seem to understand a great deal about VAT and would do well to listen at the moment—[Interruption.] I am glad that the Opposition Front Bench spokesmen are listening. The hon. Gentleman complained about the cost of the relief and suggested that it was an indication of the Government's public spending priorities. However, we are not talking about public spending priorities; we are talking about taxation yields.

If the cost of the relief is £150 million, we must remember that that £150 million is the bottom line for businesses that are not responsible for the fact that the tax has not been paid in the first place. It was not those businesses' fault that their customers had become insolvent or did not pay, but they had to pay the tax over to the Customs and Excise. It is because that system was so unfair that this change is so welcome.

The only point that I did not understand in the speech of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) was his explanation of the importance of the clause for small businesses. I remind him that, in the past few years, another important change has been made—since the introduction of VAT——

Mr. Allen: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that providing the relief does not involve real money or real spending or certain priorities in relation to Government spending?

Mr. Smith: Of course it involves real money, but it has nothing to do with the Government spending. The provision involves a reduction in the yield of VAT, and for the reasons that I have explained, I believe that that reduction in the yield is wholly justified.

I was about to say that another important change that has been made to the VAT regime in recent years is the change to cash accounting. Any business with a turnover of £250,000 or less, which must accommodate a large number if not the majority of registered traders, can switch to a system of cash accounting if it so chooses, and at any time that it so chooses. It can then not only accommodate bad debts—there will be no problems about customers who have not paid—but it has a solution to the problem of customers who pay late. Cash accounting means that the trader pays the VAT to Customs and Excise only when it has been collected from the customers.

Can my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary tell us what proportion of VAT traders have opted for cash accounting? Surely more small businesses should be encouraged to make the change, because they would not have to worry about complying with all the requirements of the provisions on bad debt relief, and they would not have to worry if some of their debtors took a long time to pay their debts, because all those factors are taken into account in cash accounting.

I believe that only a relatively small proportion of VAT traders have changed to cash accounting, and I wonder why. Is it because the system has not been publicised sufficiently? If more traders switched to that system, they would find substantial cash flow benefits and would no longer have to worry about the problems of bad debt relief. Clause 10 would then be relevant to large businesses with a turnover of more than £250,000. Although I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will comment on that, I conclude by welcoming the new provisions.

Mr. Hanley: I welcome the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), which was in stark contrast to that of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) in that it contained great good sense and was both accurate and to the point.

I, too, welcome clause 10. As my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield said when he traced the history of bad debt relief—or the absence of bad debt relief—businesses of all kinds have been hard done by in the past, which is why the relief is so welcome.

However, although the previous relief needed amending to some extent, it should not be thrown out altogether. The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales believes that the clause is a welcome extension to the existing bad debt reliefs, at least where there is no formal insolvency. However, either the present relief should be allowed to continue in addition to the new relief that has been proposed—perhaps the former should be amended to provide for the repayment of VAT for amounts that are subsequently recovered, with proof of the insolvency for the VAT-inclusive amount of the debt—or the requirement for a two-year period should be substantially reduced. It has been suggested that the two-year period should be reduced to one year. That would be possible, but I accept that if the period were reduced there would be many more cases of doubt in which a bad debt was initially claimed but where the amount was subsequently paid.

We are all aware of the need for Customs and Excise to ensure that companies do not claim double relief. However, if the two systems of bad debt relief—the old system and the new system—were allowed to run in tandem, and if a VAT payer could opt for the system that he found preferable, he might be able to avoid claiming double relief simply by the inclusion of an additional box on VAT form 100, in which only the amount of the relief that has actually been claimed would need to be given. In that way, no one could enjoy double relief.

The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales also believes that the new relief is unduly restrictive because there is an unwarranted delay where the debt has become irrecoverable within a short period after the date of supply because of the insolvency of the debtor. That point has been raised by several hon. Members, including the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith).

There is support for the fact that this is welcome relief, unless the debtor goes bankrupt, and then the delay seems far too long.

In his brief sketch of the legislation, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury——

Mr. Tim Smith: It was an outline.

8 pm

Mr. Hanley: As my hon. Friend says, it was an outline or perhaps even briefer than that. I am sure that we shall hear longer speeches from the hon. Gentleman in Committee. He also mentioned Romalpa-type goods, where goods are sold subject to reservation of title. The hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) would understand the legal title. Where the property and goods have not passed, the owner of those goods is placed in a difficult position. If the goods have disappeared, there is a bad debt, but, because the title has not passed, he is still deemed to own those goods, so there is a serious problem with clause 10(4)(b). It would operate unfairly if the title proved to be unenforceable. I am sure that the effect of that clause was not intended and was a straightforward slip which needs to be addressed. Hire purchase contracts or goods sold under reservation of title should not cause unfair disadvantage to those who have lost both the goods and, subsequently, the VAT.

Clause 10(5) mentions "regulations". It would be most helpful for all hon. Members on both sides of the Committee if those regulations were issued in draft form for comment before being laid before the House. There have been many cases during the past few years where the Revenue and the Department of Trade and Industry have been helpful over company legislation, and draft regulations issued for comment have helped to reduce final inaccuracies and argument.

That is particularly important in this clause, because accountants would like to feel that the definition of writing off a debt is at least consistent with their way of doing it. Will a debt being written off mean that the debt has to be written out of the books, or will it suffice if the full provision is made against it? The law is not clear and it would be much better if published accounts were consistent with what my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary is trying to bring into the legislation.

Presumably, the regulations will also specify the additional records that the taxpayer will have to keep to make a claim, and in what form. It is only right that practising accountants should be able to comment on that before the regulations are presented to the Committee. The Institute of Chartered Accountants in England and Wales has written to the Treasury saying it would be happy to discuss the draft with Her Majesty's Customs and Excise if it so wishes.

The bad debt relief should be available where a provision is made in respect of a debt, rather than its being written off. Should the amount prove recoverable, the debt would be repayable. It would be disappointing if best accounting practice was distorted as a result of the need to comply with the write-off requirements under the regulations. Therefore, I welcome the clause, but believe that the two or three issues raised by hon. Members from both sides of the Committee are worthy of comment. In that spirit, I support the clause.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: When one misses a Finance Bill or two, one becomes quite rusty on such matters, and I must confess that I feel a little rusty on this issue.

I should like to raise a couple of points because, if I recall correctly, early in the 1980s I spoke on an amendment to the Finance Bill in some detail having done a considerable amount of homework. I am trying to empty my mind of what I said then. Now that a scheme is in place —at that time I was arguing for the introduction of a scheme—I am concerned about what would happen if someone claimed relief, having written off a debt, and subsequently reclaimed the goods.

[Mr. Campbell-Savours]

The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) alluded to what would happen if relief was claimed and the goods were subsequently re-acquired——

Mr. Hanley: If the goods were reclaimed, the relief would have to be repayable.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I can understand that if settlement of the account finally took place, the VAT would have to be adjusted to take that into account. However, I am not sure that it is the function of the Customs and Excise authorities to police where goods have been re-acquired by manufacturers or distributors from customers who have not paid, but have been willing to relinquish control of the goods.

Mr. Hanley: I do not believe that the hon. Gentleman was in the House when the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury made exactly the same points as I did. If the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) disagrees with what I said, he is disagreeing with his own Front-Bench spokesman.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: It is not unknown for me to depart from the views of my Front-Bench spokesmen. This is the House of Commons, a debating Chamber, and we are free to speak. This is hardly a matter of huge political dimension, requiring us to take an entrenched ideological position. We are discussing to and fro the merits of a scheme. I was not here earlier because I was in the Select Committee on Members' Interests, dealing with matters that I find important and interesting.

I support the amendment to reduce the period to one year. It seems that it will be hard for Customs and Excise to police where goods have been reclaimed from customers who have had their VAT liability to the seller, distributor or supplier of the goods written off. It would be hard to monitor that.

It might be that firm A supplies to firm B £5,000-worth of merchandise. Firm B dillies and dallies and at the end of two years, firm A claims relief. Six months later, firm A may send round a couple of wagons to firm B and say, "We know that you have the goods in there and we want them back. You never paid us. We have received the money back from Customs and Excise, but you never actually paid us and we want our goods back." Firm A may go in and secure those goods. That is a reasonable case. What would happen in that instance? Will the VAT monitoring apply equally in that case, or will it partially apply? How will it be policed? I do not know.

I believe that the provision is a major concession. I remember the old days when purchase tax was 25 per cent. There was a time when it was even more. There was a purchase tax surcharge in the late 1960s when I was in business when it was as much as 35 or 37.5 per cent.—extremely high. At that time one could not reclaim it and when someone did not pay, it was a big wallop out of one's cash flow. We have seen purchase tax reduced to 8 per cent. as VAT and rise to 15 per cent. and I am sure that today, while it will not be on such a high scale, it will certainly have a major effect on cash flow when companies do not pay their bills or VAT liabilities.

I remember a particular incident in which I was involved. In 1976, in my former incarnation as a business man, I was supplying clocks to a large retailing organisation. It advertised my clock in full-page advertisements in one of the Sunday colour supplements. The company performed some clever manoeuvres when placing its orders. I was not too intelligent at the time; I was just banging out the gear, getting it into the shops to our clients, and perhaps forgetting that certain customers were building up a lot of credit. One particular customer built up credit of about £10,000—worth about £30,000 today—and then took our company for a ride. Of course, we were left to pay the bill for VAT. The rogue company never went into liquidation and we never found out what happened to it. By that time I had retired from the business to come into this blessed place. No claim was ever made, and what had previously been partly my company ended up subsidising Customs and Excise. That was wrong, and it has perhaps gone on to this day when liquidations have not taken place.

Based on my experience, I welcome a reform of this nature. But we should also consider the implications for many businesses suffering from high interest rates. Many companies in times of comparatively declining consumption and difficult market conditions—we are now entering such a period—find it hard to use all their capacity, and often find their profits falling as a result. At a time when such companies are borrowing more and more from the banks to invest in technology, as the Government told them they should, and when they are having to pay high interest rates, concessions of this sort are important because they save companies money and have a significant and positive effect on their cash flow.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I mean no disrespect to my hon. Friends or even, unusually, to Opposition Members when I say that the most fascinating speech in the debate so far has been that of my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe), who I well remember defending with passionate intensity in previous such debates positions that he now declares he believed all along to be indefensible. I know that the Economic Secretary will not be unfamiliar with that aspect of a Minister's life; but I have often spoken on previous Finance Bills to advocate broadly the sort of relief that the Government propose this evening. I greatly welcome it.

I was most interested by the speech of the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). I am delighted that he accepts the recommendations of the Institute of Directors on this matter. This is a most welcome new alliance with the Labour party, and I hope that it is contagious and will extend in due course to many of the other policies of the institute. Then we will know that perestroika has come to the Labour party in a big way.

Only one of my two amendments has been selected. They propose a slight modification of the Government's legislative proposals. In particular, they would reduce the two-year period before relief can be claimed to 13 months. It may be wondered why I selected 13 months, as opposed to 12. My first reason was that I discovered that the Labour party had selected 12—my original suggestion. However, I have been able to think up a rational justification for my change of mind. It is that 13 months can be justified as one year from the usual due date for payment after presentation of an invoice—usually 30 days or one month.

My second amendment seeks to bring forward the earliest date at which a claim under these rules can be made to 1 April 1991. That has been necessitated because my amendment to reduce to 13 months the period before relief can be claimed has the consequential effect, given the way the clause is drafted, of bringing forward the earliest claim date to 1 April 1990. Clearly it would be impossible to have a claim date earlier than that on which the regulations under the clause come into force, so I chose 1 April 1991 as a date which accommodates the reasonable suggestions of the Customs and Excise as to what is practically possible, but which seeks to bring forward the date on which the relief will become available in the interests of those who will be able to claim.

8.15 pm

I greatly welcome the Government's proposals, because proper relief of VAT on bad debts has been a notable omission from United Kingdom tax legislation, as my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) pointed out, since the inception of VAT. This inequity has been staring Governments in the face for a great many years and hon. Members on both sides of the House have campaigned strongly for many years against it, in the interests, particularly but not exclusively, of small businesses.

It is perhaps interesting to look back over the various reforms of the past 15 years or so and to see the slow steps by which we have reached this point. Section 22 of the VAT Act 1983 re-enacted provisions in the Finance Act 1978 and gave relief in cases in which there had been a formal insolvency. Then, in 1985, as my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth recalled, relief was extended to include administrative receiverships. And then, in the Finance (No. 2) Act 1987, we introduced that most valuable provision, the cash accounting scheme, for traders with a turnover of up to £250,000.

If I may supply my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield with the answer with which the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) was unable to supply him as to why we need this new relief, inasmuch as most small businesses can avail themselves of the cash accounting system which would remove the necessity for it, it is that, for whatever reason, there will be traders who do not appreciate where their true commercial tax advantage lies, and it would therefore be right to provide a catch-all relief. This provision certainly does that.

I share the view of my hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield that it would be in the interests of many more firms to take up the opportunities that the Government have provided for them. They perhaps do not sufficiently realise the advantages to their cash flow that the cash accounting scheme would provide. I should be very surprised to hear from my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary figures to show that more than a very small proportion of those who qualify for the cash accounting scheme have actually taken up the opportunity with which the Government have provided them, and I hope that they will be encouraged to do so.

In July 1988, Customs and Excise announced a review, following a commitment in the enterprise and deregulation unit's progress report earlier in the year, to look into the matter. We have been waiting a long time for this most welcome change, which the Government have introduced after a period of consideration.

My amendments seek to bring forward the point at which the benefits of this relief become available. One of the reasons why that is necessary is the very length of the period of gestation that I have described. Business deserves prompt and full relief without further ado, and I do not believe that the arguments for a two-year period are very compelling.

Attention has rightly been concentrated on the cost to the Treasury of the reduced yield of VAT that these proposals would cause. If their proper relief is expensive, that is merely a measure of the unfair burden that those businesses have had to endure for many years.

We should not be apologetic in any way about the cost to the Treasury of these proposals. That burden falls especially on small businesses which do not have the muscle that larger businesses use to make their customers pay promptly. For many small businesses, a bad debt can prove fatal. It can be the straw that breaks the camel's back, and being able to recover VAT promptly on a large bad debt can be the difference that enables a firm to survive and can stop the domino effect of default, bankruptcies and insolvencies.

This is a valuable means of preserving businesses that might otherwise be threatened. It has job-saving potential, and also the revenue-raising potential that comes from profitable businesses paying taxes rather than becoming a charge on the taxpayer as a result of failure.

The reason that I have sought to reduce the two-year period to 13 months, and why the Opposition have sought to reduce it to 12 months, is that, for most businesses, once a debt is over a year old, the likelihood of recovery is small. We should recognise that one year is a sensible period to choose, because at the end of that time, the debt is in practice unlikely to be recoverable. I hope that my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury can offer some comforting words when he replies to the points that I have made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) and the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury spoke of running in tandem the old section 22 relief and the proposals in the Bill. I support that contention, because I see nothing wrong with running the two in tandem. It may be more advantageous to businesses to seek the section 22 relief, and businesses that are used to doing that should be allowed to continue in that way.

I do not wish to sound churlish because I greatly welcome the birth of this advantageous tax relief. It coincides with the appointment to his distinguished office of my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary to the Treasury. I congratulate him on building on the work of our right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe) who covertly and strongly fought the mandarins of the Treasury all those years ago. I congratulate the Government on their proposals.

Mr. Ryder: I reiterate my gratitude to my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth (Sir B. Hayhoe). I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, being a generous man, would be happy to share the credit for the implementation of this clause with my right hon. Friend the Member for Brentford and Isleworth, for whose kind remarks I am grateful.

[Mr. Ryder]

I start by responding to some specific and technical points that were made by some of my hon. Friends and by Opposition Members, including the hon. Members for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) and for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours). My hon. Friend for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) spoke about extra boxes. I understand that the return has just been revised to make it shorter, simpler and easier for traders, and that that has been done very much along the lines that my hon. Friend suggested. That is part of the Government's deregulation drive.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) asked about numbers. I think that about 83,000 have taken up cash accounting out of a total of 600,000. That represents about 15 per cent. so far. The hon. Member for Workington conceded that he was a little rusty after all these years. This is the first time that I have had to speak about VAT from the Front Bench and I can tell him that he is not the only one who feels a little rusty.

In the debate on last year's Finance Bill, which I have read, the hon. Member for Workington spoke about corporation tax. This time he has raised the matter of policing. VAT officers will be instructed to pay special attention to bad debt relief claims during normal control visits, and they will carry out cross checking of supplies, verification and transaction testing, especially in relation to associated companies and connected persons. We have approved 20 extra staff for that very purpose and with the full implementation of the Keith committee proposals, Customs and Excise now has a fuller armoury of criminal and civil evasion powers to deal with any dishonesty that is discovered.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not there a danger that the defaulting company could claim that it has paid its account and the value added tax that was due, when in fact it has been written off by the supplying company?

Mr. Ryder: I do not think that that is a danger. During discussions that I have had about the clause it has never been drawn to my attention that it could be a danger. If the hon. Gentleman feels that the matter is worthy of further investigation, I shall certainly carry out an examination on his behalf.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury raised three specific points about clause 10(5)(g) and the powers of VAT commissioners. We are looking at the feasibility of a consultation exercise on the draft regulations. If the hon. Gentleman has any specific matter that he would like to draw to our attention in connection with that exercise, we would be grateful to receive it. Clause 10(4)(a) is a straight copy of section 32(4)(a) of the Finance Act 1985. There is no case for giving more relief than the supply is worth. I think that traders might be tempted fraudulently to inflate the value. The other technical point raised by the hon. Gentleman was in the context of section 22 of the 1983 legislation, which has been superseded by section 32 of the Finance Act 1985.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury made a great deal of the problem that some small businesses are suffering because of high interest rates. At the moment, lower interest rates are not a viable option if inflation is to come down. I draw his attention to an article last week in the Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin which stated that interest rates are an extremely effective policy instrument and that, if anything, their effectiveness has increased rather than decreased in recent years. I cannot share what I would describe as the hon. Gentleman's gloom merchant's analysis of small businesses. As one of my hon. Friends said in an intervention, there are now about 1,500 net new businesses starting every week.

Ms. Abbott: How many bankruptcies are there?

Mr. Ryder: The figure that I have given is net. The net figure during the last full year of a Labour Government was a loss of 100 rather than a gain of 1,500. It was minus 100 and not plus 1,500.

Mr. Battle: Is not the crucial point how long those businesses last? Businesses may start up, but if they do not survive the year, the figures are meaningless.

Mr. Ryder: If they do not survive the year, they go into the next year's figures. This is a net figure, a rolling figure. It is the figure of the new VAT regulations, which is in the public domain and constantly used by the Government.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I do not think the Minister understands the importance of the intervention made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). We are discussing bad debt. If, while pressing his case, the Minister is forced to accept that a large number of companies are dropping out of business or becoming insolvent, he is accepting that there is a disproportionately higher level of debt today than previously. If people are dropping out of business, the chances are that it is because of insolvency and they will leave debts behind. Surely it cannot be the Government's policy to promote a climate of business expansion which is reliant on the odd few getting through and a majority dropping out, creating immeasurable damage in terms of bad debt liability with the consequences of that on those who survive. We cannot run a modern economy on that basis. Who is protecting whom in those circumstances?

8.30 pm

Mr. Ryder: I do not deny that many small businesses are experiencing serious problems. With interest rates at their present level, it would be unusual if they were not. But I gave the net figure of new businesses starting up. There is no denying that many small businesses are closing and that many that are not closing are suffering from some of the problems to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

Clause 10 is another step towards improved conditions for small businesses, and most hon. Members who have spoken have expressed their support for it. It follows a catalogue of tax cuts undertaken by the Government since 1979. I am grateful for that support for the general thrust of the measures that have been incorporated in the clause.

Clause 10(6) provides for the making of regulations to cover the accounting requirements of the new scheme. They will provide that any trader wishing to claim bad debt relief will be required to maintain a separate bad debt relief account. When a debt is deemed to be bad, the trader will enter the debt in the bad debt relief account. That will be regarded as write-off for the purpose of the clause, as the debt will have been tranferred from whatever form of current account the trader maintains.

Concern has been expressed by hon. Members and by interested organisations outside the House that the requirement for write-off might not be met until a trader's accounts are audited or approved at a general meeting. I hope that the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) will accept that amendment No. 37 addresses an unfounded fear. However, should the accounts subsequently be rejected by the auditors or the general meeting in matters affecting bad debts, the clawback procedures would be appropriate.

Amendment No. 38 has been tabled by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed because he believes that traders supplying goods under certain contracts—for example, Romalpa—will be at a disadvantage. I do not think that that will be the case, because under such contracts the seller reserves title until the customer has paid for the goods. If the customer does not pay, the seller can either reclaim the goods, in which case there is no debt, or he can relinquish title to the goods and become eligible for bad debt relief. The amendment would allow the seller to do both. In other words, there would be double relief, and that would not be wholly justified.

Mr. Beith: Does that mean that a trader can self-certify that the debt cannot be recovered and so transfer title and, in some cases, if a person cannot be traced so that transfer cannot be formally effected, he can simply report to Customs and Excise that he has surrendered title and claim VAT relief?

Mr. Ryder: That is a possibility.

Amendment No. 1 was echoed by an amendment in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) which was not called. It proposes that our new scheme should co-exist with the previous bad debt relief provisions which relied on formal insolvency. The argument here is that when a company goes into formal insolvency, within a period of two years the creditor is worse off under the new arrangements than he was under the old arrangements. Much has been made of that by some commentators outside the House, but I wonder how often that would arise in practice.

I am told that it takes on average 18 months for a creditor to pursue a debt from the initial supply of goods or services to unsuccessful enforcement through county court procedures. Only then might a creditor contemplate insolvency as a means of recovering at least part of the debt owed to him. I would certainly expect companies to think twice about supplying goods or services on credit to a company which has already experienced problems in paying others.

If we were to go down that route of dual running, there would be considerable administrative complexities for business men and for Customs and Excise, who would have to guard against the possibility of claims being made under both systems. One of the virtues of the system that we are proposing is that relief is automatic. Therefore, in principle, it should be simple to operate.

Amendment No. 3 is the core of the debate, as was acknowledged by the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury. It seeks to reduce the waiting period before bad debt relief can be claimed from two years to 12 months. A cut in the time limit also found favour with, among others, my hon. Friends the Members for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson) and for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton). My hon. Friend the Member for Tatton tabled an amendment for 13 months rather than 12 months. Amendment No. 24 in his name is a consequential amendment which would follow if amendment No. 3 were to be accepted.

I would expect a company, before it wrote off a debt, to make every attempt to recover not only the VAT, which would be a fairly small proportion of the sum, but the debt itself. In our judgment, two years is the appropriate period which should elapse before a company decides that a debt is irrecoverable.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Why?

Mr. Ryder: If the hon. Gentleman waits a second, I shall explain.

Mr. Boateng: That is what we are waiting for.

Mr. Ryder: I always leave the good news to the end, as the hon. Gentleman, our favourite Jacobin, knows.

Our judgment was that two years is an appropriate period of time to elapse before a company decides that a debt cannot be recovered. We are also conscious that too short a period might be open to deliberate abuse by fraudsters.

I am aware of the strength of feeling expressed in the debate and by the many organisations that have made representations to the Treasury. For those reasons, I have concluded that there may be scope for further improvement to the scheme. We shall be examining that possibility between now and Report stage.

I began today's proceedings by saying, in response to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), that I was cordial, friendly, co-operative and helpful. It is in that spirit that I have put forward the views that I have. On that basis, I hope that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. Chris Smith: I begin by thanking the Economic Secretary for his remarks about possibly issuing the draft regulations relating to clause 10 for comment before they are submitted to the House. We hope that that will be done. Certainly my right hon. and hon. Friends and I will want to take a vigorous part in such a consultation exercise.

I thank the Minister for his comments about the provisions of the clause as they effect hire purchase or Romalpa arrangements. As far as I could tell, the Economic Secretary was saying that, if title to the goods is relinquished by a decision of their supplier, bad debt relief can be claimed. I hope that I have correctly understood the Minister's remarks.

I was not entirely convinced by the hon. Gentleman's answers to questions asked by ourselves and the Liberal Democrats concerning the precise definition of accounts and the effect that an entry in the books of a company before accounts have been audited or published might have on the provisions of the clause. Perhaps we can continue to examine that over the next month or two.

As to the two major issues before the Committee, we have made substantial progress on amendment No. 3, and it would be churlish of me not to acknowledge that the Economic Secretary's response was extremely positive. We hope that, as our discussions progress, the Government will bring forward a new clause or amendment on Report to cover the points encompassed by amendment No. 3, and that their response is a harbinger of other changes of mind. It is good to see that happening so early in our discussions. We have struck gold. We find that the Government are accepting the wisdom and sense of amendments that we have tabled.

[Mr. Chris Smith]

Accordingly, I shall happily seek permission to withdraw amendment No. 3, and await our return to the issue to which it relates.

The Economic Secretary was somewhat less forthcoming in respect of amendment No. 1. We believe that a reduction in the time period from two years to one year would be useful; and that it would be sensible and right to run the existing system of relief in the case of insolvency together with the new one of automatic relief after a certain period has elapsed. Even with the shortened time period, in some cases—such as where insolvency occurs after three months—a supplier will have to wait another 12 months before being eligible for bad debt relief under the new system. We still want to press amendment No. 1, which seeks to allow the two systems to run alongside one another—but we give a warm welcome to the Economic Secretary's comments on amendment No. 3.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): The debate that has just taken place related to amendment No. 2. Am I to understand that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) wishes to withdraw amendment No. 2?

Mr. Chris Smith: Yes, Sir Paul. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 1, in clause 10, page 6, line 45, after 'elapsed', insert

', or the company or individual liable to pay any outstanding amount of the consideration has become insolvent and (except where Paragraph 10 (1A)(b) below applies) the person has submitted a claim in the insolvency for the outstanding amount of the consideration.

(1A) a company becomes insolvent for the purposes of this section if:

(a) it goes into liquidation in the United Kingdom or the Isle of Man at a time when its assets are insufficient for the payment of its debts and other liabilities and the expenses of the winding up;

(b) a person who has been appointed in Great Britain to act as the Administrator or Administrative Receiver issues a certificate of his opinion that, if it went into liquidation, the assets of the company would be insufficient to cover the payment of any dividend in respect of debts which are neither secured nor preferential; or

(c) a composition or scheme proposed by the Directors is approved under Part I of the Insolvency Act 1986.

(1B) An individual becomes insolvent for the purposes of this section if:

(a) in England and Wales he is adjudged bankrupt, a deed of arrangement is made for the benefit of his creditors, a composition or scheme proposed by him is approved under Part VIII of the Insolvency Act 1986 or, after his death, his estate falls to be administered in accordance with an order under Part XV of that Act;

(b) in Scotland, sequestration of his estate is awarded, he signs a trust deed for his creditors or, after his death, a judicial factor is appointed under Section 11A of the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act 1889 to administer his estate;

(c) in Northern Ireland he is adjudged bankrupt, a deed of arrangement is made for the benefit of his creditors, a resolution of his creditors is approved by the court under Section 5 of the Bankruptcy Amendment Act (Northern Ireland) 1929 or, after his death, the court makes an order for the administration in bankruptcy of his estate; or

(d) in the Isle of Man, he is adjudged bankrupt, a deed of arrangement is made for the benefit of his creditors or, after his death, the court makes an order for the administration in bankruptcy of his estate.'.—[Mr. Chris Smith.]

HYDROCARBON OIL. 1979 C. 5

Dr. Marek: I beg to move amendment No. 33, in page 2, line 16, leave out '£0·1902 and insert £0·18'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 22, in page 2, line 23, leave out '£0·0299' and insert '£0·035'.

No. 39, in page 2, line 23, leave out '£0·0299' and insert '£0·0383'.

Dr. Marek: Amendments Nos. 22 and 39 are similar, but amendment 22 was tabled by the Opposition and amendment No. 39 by the Liberal party. They are important amendments as they affect our environment and what will happen to the country, and because last year, after a debate, the Government made certain welcome concessions and took steps to ensure that there was a good differential between leaded and unleaded petrol.

The amendment would reduce the price of unleaded petrol by a modest amount. We hope that the Government will see the sense of that and, if they cannot accept the amendment, perhaps the Economic Secretary, who is to reply to the debate, will be able to offer some concessions in future years or in future budgets.

The Economic Secretary is, however, in great trouble. It was not a green Budget. Perhaps it could be said that the additional 2p differential on leaded petrol was a green measure. However, that was due to the 10 per cent. uprating of petrol of all types. Such a differential naturally leads to an increase in the differential between the price of leaded and unleaded petrol. The Treasury could do nothing about green measures in the Budget; it was waiting for the Secretary of State for the Environment to publish his Green Paper on the Government's intentions regarding the environment.

We have been led to expect a carbon tax and other radical proposals in the White Paper that is to be published in the autumn. However, according to the Sunday newspapers, the green tax on petrol proposal has been ruled out and will not be included in the White Paper that is being prepared by the Secretary of State for the Environment. In March he said that a green tax was an essential part of the Government's economic policies. Now, however, it has been ruled out. According to an unattributable briefing by a working party spokesman:

"Nobody in their right mind would expect a substantial increase in energy prices in the run-up to an election."

The Government have their eye on the next election. Therefore, the environment does not matter. What matters to them is that they should hold on to power. They do not mind what happens to the country. They are concerned only about the election. They are not concerned about green policies and the effect of existing policies on the environment, or about protecting the environment, or creating a better one.

According to the unattributable briefing, the White Paper will discuss fuel taxation but it will not commit the Government to any moves, even if they are inflation-neutral, and it will be up to the Treasury to decide what petrol duties should be. If it is for the Treasury to decide what those duties should be, the Treasury should have insisted upon being told earlier this year so that the Budget could include measures that represented Treasury thinking on petrol taxation and how it saw its role in improving the environment.

It is important to encourage people to use unleaded petrol. In March 1989, 15 per cent. of all cars used unleaded petrol. In the previous year, the figure was only 2 to 3 per cent. That was a good increase, although not as large as some of us had wanted. By October 1989, the differential between leaded and unleaded petrol was 28 per cent. Unfortunately, the differential has remained at almost the same figure; it is now about 30 per cent. A number of organisations argue that the differential must be greater. An additional tax on leaded petrol is not required, but the Government could forgo a little tax on unleaded petrol. Last year the Treasury paid back £7 billion of the national debt, so it could offer a slightly greater differential on unleaded petrol. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) always intervenes from a sedentary position and I can never hear her.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): I was simply making the self-evident observation that the Opposition incur debts and we pay them back.

Dr. Marek: That is not the case.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: It is.

Dr. Marek: We have the highest balance of payments deficit in our entire history. Even invisible earnings during the last few months of 1989 went into deficit for the first time ever. It comes ill from the hon. Member for Lancaster to say that the Government pay back the debts that we incur.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Marek: I shall give way again to the hon. Lady, if necessary, but she must make more substantial points if she wishes to gain the Committee's attention. Many hon. Members want to contribute to this important debate.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: Ever since the French revolution, we have borrowed a good deal. Each Labour Government have borrowed more, and Conservative Governments have paid it back.

Dr. Marek: The hon. Lady must examine the curves for the national debt in the past 150 years. It is true that it increased during the first and second world wars, but it has decreased under Labour as well as Conservative Governments. [Interruption.] Conservative Members need only examine the graph, and it will become clear. They will see that during the last war—under a coalition led by a Conservative Prime Minister—the levels were high.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman rose——

Dr. Marek: Let us talk about unleaded petrol instead. The problem is that the number of cars using unleaded petrol has remained stuck at about 28 or 30 per cent. for the past six months. We need an incentive for people to change to unleaded petrol. They will not do so now, because the argument has gone off the boil.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Surely the 28 per cent. figure reflects the number of cars that cannot be changed to unleaded petrol. However, the figure is liable to go up regardless of any changes in duty that may occur in the next few months as more and more new cars run on unleaded petrol from the word go.

Dr. Marek: More cars could change to unleaded petrol than are doing so now.

We must remember that lead in petrol damages the heart, the kidneys and the central nervous system—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Lancaster is moaning again, but it is true. Lead in petrol causes anaemia and high blood pressure, and can be responsible for abortion and stillbirths. It is an evil that we can do without.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton) is not in his place—perhaps he is pursuing a constituency interest—because not so many years ago he argued for the retention of leaded petrol. I hope that no Conservative Member will do that tonight.

Opposition Members are not happy that the Chancellor has increased the price of petrol by 10 per cent. across the board. We had hoped for a differential between leaded and unleaded petrol, but there was none in the Budget.

There are also the problems of the 10 per cent. of disabled people who use the Motability scheme. Those people have their vehicles on a lease basis over a three-year period. Therefore, when the price of petrol increases, they can do less mileage. I do not expect an answer now from the Economic Secretary, but perhaps he can write to me later, as the problem is serious. I remind him that there are several well-known patrons of Motability, who I hope will agree that there is a case for examining the amount of finance available to Motability. Those who participate in the scheme suffer when the price of petrol rises above the rate of inflation.

Included among those patrons are the right hon. Member for Wallasey (Mrs. Chalker), the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), the right hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore), the right hon. Member for Braintree (Mr. Newton), the right hon. Member for Chelsea (Mr. Scott), and finally, at the bottom of the list, the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher). With patrons like those, there should be no need for me to plead the case for fair treatment for Motability; However, I am doing so because the matter must be mentioned. I hope that what I have said will be considered by the Treasury—I see the Economic Secretary nodding. The EC Commission is pressing for a 30p differential between leaded petrol and DERV. At present the differential is only 20p and our amendment would widen it a little.

Our usage of diesel accounts for about 5 per cent. of the market, which is much less than most other European countries. I have a graph, although not the actual figures, which shows that if our usage is about 5 per cent., it must be about 10 per cent. in Germany, perhaps 28 per cent. in France and about 12 per cent. in Italy. So we are behind other European countries in the use of diesel. We could do more by increasing the differential because diesel can be a better fuel. It does not contain lead and it is 30 per cent. more economical, thus reducing the level of carbon dioxide emissions. When fitted with a three-way converter, it could be cleaner than anything that a petrol engine could offer. I do not have time to elaborate on those points, but I know that some of my hon. Friends hope to speak about them.

In summary, it is clear that more needs to be done. We had expected some green tinges to the Budget, but in the event it turned out to be grey on those issues. Perhaps the Treasury was caught out by the Secretary of State for the Environment, who was to have done great things but will not now do them. We shall be interested to hear the Economic Secretary's remarks. He will need to make some encouraging noises to prevent us from pushing the amemdment to a Division.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) raised the important issue of unleaded petrol. The Government will wish seriously to bear his arguments in mind, but I hope that they will bear equally in mind the plight of unfortunate people such as I who bought a British car and found that it was not capable of being converted to take unleaded petrol.

One is often anxious to do the right thing—for example, to buy a good British car or use unleaded petrol—and bearing in mind the balance of payments problem to which the hon. Member for Wrexham referred, I regard it as my duty to buy British whenever possible.

The increase in the price of petrol as a result of the Budget was substantial. It went up by 10 per cent. for leaded and unleaded, adding 11p to a gallon of leaded and 9p to a gallon of unleaded petrol. The tax differential is now 15·6p per gallon and unleaded petrol now has about 30 per cent. of the market.

As I say, it was a substantial price rise. Most people have not noticed the extent of the increase because, at the same time as we had the increase, all petrol stations seemed to make the dramatic change from gallons to litres, and it is now difficult to work out the difference. I am reminded of what happened when we switched to decimal currency; with the change of system came a substantial rise in prices.

Whether or not the public are aware of what has happened, they would like to know whether the increases are part of a general move by the Government to implement the terms of the Single European Act and to aim to harmonise our taxation system in so far as that is necessary for the completion of the internal market.

In the debate on the motor vehicle market on 26 April, the Government made it clear that they continued to believe that centrally imposed tax approximation was unnecessary and inappropriate. Are the Government aiming at the harmonisation of indirect taxes and excise duties by 1992 in so far as that is necessary to complete the internal market?

The Minister will be aware that that would involve dramatic changes for Britain. It would mean, for example, a reduction of about £3 billion in the taxes on alcohol and cigarettes. That would bring joy to some, but not to those who would have to pay the £3 billion, which would have to be imposed on necessities.

If the Minister cannot avoid those measures, the people of Britain are entitled to know. I am not saying that the Government are right or wrong, but, quite honestly, I have not the slightest idea what the Government's policy is. It is terribly important that people should know. If we are about to move towards approximation with the EEC countries, that will mean rather dramatic changes in the tax we pay. It will mean, for example, much cheaper beer, much cheaper whisky, and significantly cheaper cigarettes, but essentials will go up and petrol will have to go up quite substantially.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the clause and the amendments deal only with hydrocarbon oils.

9.15 pm

Mr. Taylor: That is why I stress that hydrocarbon oils are only part of the budget. We want to know whether the provisions are part of a move towards approximation.

Finally, if the Government do not consider that approximation is necessary on motor vehicles as well as on petrol, have they taken a legal view on whether the terms of the Single European Act could require them to do so if the Commission takes the view that member states have not approximated the taxes on petrol in so far as is necessary to complete the internal market? The Minister will be well aware of the problem as it has been drawn to the Government's attention many times. Many of us who sat through the late nights considering the Single European Act were worried that, although it stated that we had a veto, the clause states that we are committed to approximating in so far as it is necessary to complete the internal market. If the Commission does not think that we have a veto, what will happen?

I hope that the Minister will say, purely in relation to the clause and amendments dealing with hydrocarbon oils, whether the Government intend to move towards harmonisation in so far as it is necessary to complete the internal market, and whether they have taken a legal opinion as to whether they might be obliged to do so? Whether the answer is yes or no, it will mean a great deal to the British public. I know that there are different views, as there may well be different views in the Committee, but we are entitled to know exactly what the Government's policy is on one of the most dramatic aspects of taxation in our time.

Mr. Beith: The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) has raised two points of relevance to the debate. The way in which petrol prices are displayed has a considerable effect on whether the differential appears significant to the motorist. He might have been suggesting that the fact that garages started displaying their prices in litres just when the prices were going up had something to do with Europe. But it was nothing of the kind; it was a direct result of a decision by the Government which led to an adverse report from the Select Committee on Trade and Industry and a prayer tabled against the regulations which had the signature of more than 200 right hon. and hon. Members.

That prayer was never debated because the Government were too embarrassed to allow it to be debated, but it was entirely at the insistence of the Government and nothing to do with Europe that the rule was changed so that garage proprietors are not obliged to show prices in gallons as well as in litres. I consider that the Government made a grave mistake and that they should have responded to the pressures from hon. Members on all sides of the House not to do that. The result was to make it more difficult for motorists to compare prices, particularly when increases are taking place.

It is still more difficult to make a realistic comparison. Perhaps I am getting old, but I still measure petrol prices in gallons because that is the term that makes sense to me. If people want measure in litres, that is fine for them, but why should not both prices be displayed? If the Government want to persuade motorists that there is a significant differential, why do they reduce the apparent differential by having the prices displayed only in litres?

A garage can voluntarily display the prices in gallons, but the Government have removed the obligation to do so. I suggest that hon. Members should support those garages which inform their customers properly and continue to show their prices in gallons as well as litres. That is certainly my practice and I hope that others will do the same.

There is no need whatsoever to achieve harmonisation of the duty on hydrocarbon oils across the Community to complete the single market. The only threat to the single market would be if different prices were charged in one country for commodities which came from other countries, thereby obtaining some price advantage.

There is reasonable pressure to harmonise in adjoining countries, where travel between the two is easy. Obviously, large differences in the price of petrol would lead to much cross-border driving to fill up with petrol in the neighbouring country—as, for example, between Northern Ireland and the Republic of Ireland. There is not the slightest reason why we should be constrained in rates of duty on petrol or on diesel by the fact that there remain differences with other countries in the European Community. It will not be worth anyone's while to pay a considerable fare to come on a ferry to get petrol cheaper here. Anyway, restrictions should be observed for safety reasons on the carriage of petrol in ferries. Harmonisation is not necessary, and I hope that the Government will remain vigorous in protesting that view in European discussions.

There is much at stake in this little bit of the Bill, because this is the entire Treasury commitment to greenery. When Treasury Ministers appear before the electorate, or go before their maker and are asked, "What have you done as a Treasury Minister to protect the environment?", all they can say is that the Economic Secretary wore a green tie for the debates on the Bill and that they had a differential on unleaded petrol.

I welcome the differential on unleaded petrol, for which I argued before its introduction. It is proving its value, but we expected more from the Budget. Where are the other measures which the Government could have taken—the grading of vehicle excise duty by engine size, a more rigorous approach to company car tax provisions, incentives to fit catalytic converters, measures designed to deal with noxious emissions——

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman will realise that he is straying from the amendments.

Mr. Beith: I have made my case, Sir Paul. There were so many other areas into which Treasury Ministers could have gone to demonstrate that they were serious about the environment, that they place a great obligation on the leaded and unleaded petrol differential when it is their sole contribution.

It is not unreasonable, therefore, that some of us have tabled amendments to make the differential greater. Let us at least try to get this right. Clearly, there is a need for further substantial conversion, and a wider differential would help to achieve it. The amendments are designed to make sure that there is a difference of 15p per gallon at the pumps, not in the taxation rate. A complicated calculation has to take place wih the figures in the Bill to find out what the figure should be at the pumps.

There is a case for an even larger differential. As the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) pointed out, the differential for diesel in other countries is much greater than it is here. In some Scandinavian countries, the price of diesel at the pumps is only half that of petrol. There are problems about diesel. Work needs to be done to make sure that, in its use, we are environmentally friendly, but it is possible to be so, as the hon. Member for Wrexham pointed out.

I urge the Government to have a wider differential in favour of unleaded petrol and to reject the pleadings of their hon. Friends who in previous years were opposed to any differential. The hon. Member for Tatton (Mr. Hamilton), who took part in the debate last year, said that there should be no differential. I am glad that the Government have gone at least some way along the road. I believe that they should go further.

Mr. Mans: I am encouraged by the comments of the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) on unleaded petrol. Despite what other members of the Labour party have said, he at least is encouraging the use of cars rather than public transport. Apart from that, I have sympathy with his view on unleaded petrol, having introduced a short Bill on the subject some 18 months ago.

The hon. Gentleman should make his case better. An increase in the differential would mean a larger take-up of unleaded petrol by the car-owning public. We should keep a clear idea of the objectives—to increase the number of motor cars that can use unleaded petrol and to increase the number of cars that are converted. Simply to increase the differential would be an expensive way of achieving those objectives.

Before the previous Budget, when the differential was increased, there was already plenty of evidence, although there was only 3p or 4p difference between the two prices, that people were already converting to unleaded petrol as a result of the promotional activities by the petrol companies and the manufacturers. Unleaded petrol week, which took place at the end of 1988, achieved much. I needed to be convinced then and I need even more to be convinced now that to decrease the amount of duty, which would involve a considerable sum, is the best way of using the money to encourage people to use unleaded petrol. I should much prefer the Government once again to encourage by promotional activities through the car companies and the petrol companies the use of unleaded petrol.

I wholly agree with some of the points made by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith). There is not enough physical evidence at petrol stations of the price differential. In the case of some companies, such as British Petroleum, it is difficult to tell which pump has the unleaded petrol, because the new logo is green and yellow. That needs to be changed.

Mr. Robert B. Jones (Hertfordshire, West): I have taken up that point with BP and it has promised to look again at the somewhat indiscriminate use of green because of the misleading impression that it gives.

Mr. Mans: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. As I said, far more could be done at considerably less cost to the Exchequer to achieve an increase in the amount of unleaded petrol used by methods other than increasing the differential between the two fuels.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) talked about three-way catalytic converters, but in relation to diesel fuels, he should have referred to the catalytic trap. Amendment No. 33 does not seem to relate to diesel vehicles with a catalytic trap, but to all vehicles that use diesel. Before we go down that route, there must be far more evidence that there are no risks to health from diesel fumes. I am thinking especially of diesel vehicle emissions that can be carcinogenic. Last year in Germany, for example, where there had been an increase year by year in the number of diesel cars sold, the figure went down for the first time in five or six years as a result of that worry about health. There is equal worry about photochemical smog, especially in cities, as a result of diesel emissions. It is probably a mistake at this stage to use diesel more extensively when there is still much evidence to suggest that there are health effects about which we do not know fully.

Mr. Allen: Clause 3 is probably the most disappointing in the Bill. Above all, it exemplifies a missed opportunity. It deals with the changes in duty on leaded and unleaded petrol and on diesel, but sadly it is, as has been said previously, the green fig leaf to a Budget which could have been very green. We all accept that the Chancellor was constrained by his predecessor, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), and by his mistakes. No doubt he was also constrained by "her next door", by the high interest rates, by the rate of inflation which is the record for the G7 countries, by the monumental trade deficit which has built up under the current Administration and by the other economic circumstances. Having said all that, with a little more ambition and imagination, the Budget could have been creative through clause 3, and other green issues could have been raised. It is a missed opportunity.

There is nothing in the Budget on reducing VAT to encourage recycled material. There are no tax incentives to ensure the use of items that otherwise would not be used. Sadly, there is nothing in the Bill to encourage insulation.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. I remind the hon. Gentleman that this clause and the amendment are concerned solely with hydrocarbon oils.

Mr. Allen: Indeed, but the clause contains no reference to the sizes of engines that use those oils, petrols and diesel fuels. Other countries have introduced a rigorous regime of pricing according to engine size, but unfortunately such a regime has not been introduced here.

9.30 pm

The Government have tried to get green credit by simply increasing the duty on all fuels by 10 per cent. Almost by accident there has been a very slight increase in the price differential. That has occurred not by design, but simply because all the fuels increased in price by exactly the same proportion. That is not enough.

It has almost been taken as read in this debate, but I must repeat it again, that lead in petrol can kill. The case is overwhelming that lead in petrol causes accumulations that affect foetal development, birth weights and the size of the circumferences of children's heads. It produces all those difficulties. A high level of lead in blood is now, beyond a shadow of a doubt, a serious problem which must be tackled.

I commend what the Government have already done to tackle that problem. However, we must continue that battle to ensure that more motorists use unleadeded or diesel. The percentage of drivers using unleaded has stagnated at around 30 per cent. Unleaded needs a further boost and the amendment would encourage that.

The hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) referred to European harmonisation. Harmonisation is a million miles away and I hope that the hon. Gentleman is not too happy about harmonisation on this issue. The price of leaded fuel in some European countries is far higher than it is here. If it was a little higher here and if unleaded was a little cheaper, far more people would use unleaded. Leaded petrol in Denmark is £2·77 a gallon. In Ireland it is £2·68 and in Italy it is £2·97. Only three countries out of 12 in Europe have cheaper leaded petrol than the United Kingdom.

We have seen what other countries have done with regard to the differential. We have seen the continuing effect of that. I hope that we have a Division on this amendment because it is important that people outside this place understand that the Labour party—we hope that we shall be joined by the smaller Opposition parties—is still determined to carry on the good work that has started. I hope that they understand that that work has not ended and that it should continue until the vast majority of motorists use unleaded fuel.

Mrs. Mahon: Like my colleagues, I do not apologise for drawing attention to the fact that lead is very dangerous. Some 80 per cent. of lead in the atmosphere comes from petrol. We should remind ourselves regularly just what lead does to us. As my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) said, it damages the central nervous system. It causes anaemia and it is particularly damaging to children who are vulnerable to its effects because their brains and nervous systems are still developing. Children absorb lead far more quickly than adults.

Mr. Battle: Does my hon. Friend agree that the very close proximity of inner-city schools and playgrounds to the busiest roads is at the heart of the problem of lead affecting small children?

Mrs. Mahon: Yes, there is well-documented, tragic evidence to that effect. At the moment there is an argument about at what level the intake of lead begins to harm people, and especially children. Evidence is growing that a threshold level at which harm starts to be caused does not exist and that the effect is a continuum. Low levels of lead can cause harm. We believe that any level is harmful. That is why one of our amendments would reduce the tax on diesel, which is lead-free and, as far as we know, much less harmful——

Mr. Mans rose——

Mrs. Mahon: No, I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman because he has made his points and I should like my hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) to have his chance.

Diesel is more economical and reduces the level of carbon dioxide emissions. Therefore, we contend that the differential between leaded petrol and diesel should be increased as should that between leaded and unleaded petrol.

The pricing differential between leaded and unleaded petrol has been fairly successful. I do not think that any hon. Member would argue with the fact that it is has encouraged motorists to change to unleaded petrol. Nevertheless, as my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) said, we seem to have reached stagnation point. In March 1989, unleaded petrol sales accounted for about 15 per cent. of the market; by October 1989, they accounted for 28 per cent., but since then there is no doubt that the campaign has stalled. It is estimated that by March this year the percentage of petrol sales accounted for by unleaded fuel had climbed to about 30 per cent. However, it is also estimated that another 20 per cent. of motorists could switch to unleaded petrol without engine conversion. It is true that 6 million cars use unleaded petrol, but that leaves 9 million cars that do not. Despite all the hype there is still an awfully long way to go.

I agree that the Budget was grey rather than green. The Chancellor should at least have acknowledged the urgency of the environmental issues that are facing everybody in this country, if not in the world. I know that you, Sir Paul would rule me out of order if I were to discuss some of the issues to improve the environment for which we are calling, so I shall not do so.

If accepted, our amendments would take us some way along the road to reducing the amount of lead in the air. As I am sure that that would be welcomed by everybody outside the House—and certainly by all Opposition Members, if not by all Conservative Members—I urge the Minister to accept our amendments.

Mr. Martlew: The Chancellor's decision on unleaded petrol was symbolic of the whole Budget. It was a missed opportunity. His decision did not extract inflation from the economy and did not extract poison from the atmosphere. The Budget left us with an economy that will be ruined for future generations, just as many of our children's minds will be ruined because the Chancellor did not take the opportunity of increasing the differential between leaded and unleaded petrol.

The right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson) has been blamed for many things, but at least we could say that he had a green tinge about him. He certainly has a green tinge these days but perhaps those of us who are not getting his salary should be the ones with a green tinge.

I am sorry that the Economic Secretary will have to reply to this debate, and not the Chancellor. When he served at the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Gentleman had a very good environmental reputation. Indeed, if he had still been a Minister in that Department, I doubt whether we would have this problem with mad cow disease. I notice that the hon. Gentleman is wearing a green tie. Perhaps that is a coded message to us that he does not believe what he is going to say, but that he has to say it anyway.

Lead is dangerous—there is no argument from either side about that. I do not accept the argument of the hon. Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) that price differential does makes no difference to the public's buying power. That was the implication of his remarks. At one time he praised petrol companies for their efforts and then he criticised them for trying to disguise which petrol was leaded and which unleaded. That sounded a peculiar argument to me.

The Government increased taxation on unleaded petrol by 10 per cent. That was anti-environmental and anti-green because they actually increased the cost of unleaded petrol by 10 per cent. If they had wanted to get the same amount of revenue, they could have increased the differentials. That would not have made a major difference in the total cost, but would have encouraged people to go for unleaded petrol. We should be aiming for a system in which those who do not use unleaded petrol, use diesel and all of us have catalytic converters on our cars to help the environment. But the provision has done nothing towards that.

If the Government had not wanted to put up the price of unleaded petrol, they could have put up the road tax —that was an option. Many Opposition Members are suspicious of the Government's reasons for refusing to put up road tax. We believe that they are getting ready to do away with it, and will put its cost on the price of petrol, both leaded and unleaded, in the not too distant future. They are not honest about that because they are deeply concerned about what rural voters will think about the abolition of the road tax. That is why the Government decided to increase the tax on unleaded petrol by 10 per cent.

Some of my hon. Friends have been too kind to the Government. They said that it is a grey Budget. They were right; it is the colour of the Chancellor's hair. Through their action, the Government are being anti-environment and anti those of us who are consumers and decide that we want to buy environmentally friendly products.

The only way the Budget has helped the environment is by closing some factories and reducing pollution in that way. I noticed that the job losses in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) were blamed on the downturn in the car industry. If there was a greater differential between the price of leaded and unleaded petrol, it might encourage some of us who have cars that cannot be converted to change to new cars. That would give the economy an impetus. But, of course, that is exactly what the Chancellor does not want us to do. We cannot have any growth, whether green or otherwise.

The Government have let down the people of this country. They have let the cat out of the bag. They pay only lip service to the environment, and when it comes down to the pounds, shillings and pence, they do not give a damn.

Mr. Ryder: I thank the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) for his kind remarks. I do not know what causes mad cow disease but I hope—indeed I am sure—that it is not leaded petrol.

Amendment No. 33 calls for the rate of excise duty on heavy oil to be reduced. It would also increase the tax differential between DERV and leaded petrol. DERV already has a duty advantage over petrol, but increasing the differential will have only a limited effect because most DERV is used for road freight lorries. It might encourage more people to switch to using diesel rather than petrol cars, but unfortunately United Kingdom manufacturers lag behind their competitors in the number and range of diesel cars they offer. I think that the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) would acknowledge that. For example, Ford, Peugeot Talbot and Rover have a limited production of diesel cars in the United Kingdom, but we have no long-term tradition of such production here, by contrast with some continental manufacturers, such as Mercedes-Benz, Volkswagen and Citroen.

Increases in the cost of DERV affect virtually every United Kingdom business by raising costs. Last year we did not increase DERV duty at all. This year my right hon. Friend the Chancellor felt it necessary to make some increases, although they are a little higher than required to keep the duty in line with inflation. This is offset in some measure by freezing vehicle excise duty on buses, coaches, taxis and many lorries for this year. Although the duty on United Kingdom DERV is higher than that in some EEC countries—I readily concede that it is—many of our Community partners such as Belgium, Denmark, France, Ireland, Italy and the Netherlands apply a higher—some of them a much higher—rate of VAT to DERV than we do. And some countries such as Spain, Portugal and France do not allow their businesses to deduct all of that VAT.

I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that we have made it clear on several occasions that we do not consider a tax approximation necessary for the completion of the single market. As he knows, the proposals require unanimity in the Council of Ministers, so our position is safeguarded.

9.45 pm

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) said that the price of DERV was too high and contrasted it with the price in some Scandinavian countries, but, as I have said, several countries with low DERV duties apply higher VAT rates than we do and do not allow businesses to deduct all the VAT that they then incur on their purchases of DERV.

Amendments Nos. 22 and 39 call for the Government to do more of what we are doing already for unleaded petrol, by increasing the differential between leaded and unleaded petrol to 4·03p per litre, including VAT, or—I share the view of the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed about gallons—to 18·30p per gallon. I welcome that as a sign of support for our strategy over the past three Finance Acts, in which we have steadily increased the differential. As the Committee knows, we introduced the duty differential between leaded and unleaded petrol way back in 1987 to encourage the wider use of unleaded petrol. We did so because of the widespread concern about levels of lead in the atmosphere and in the blood, particularly in that of children. I know that the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), and many other hon. Members are anxious about that.

The hon. Member for Wrexham said that the consumption of unleaded petrol had not yet risen to 30 per cent., but it has risen to more than 30 per cent. now. I was not a member of the Finance Bill Committee last year, but I think I am right to say that the hon. Member threw down a challenge to the Government in that Committee that the take-up of unleaded should rise to more than 30 per cent. by this time in 1990. We have met that target and we hope and expect that the take-up of this form of petrol will increase to 40 per cent. by the end of the year. That has been helped by the fact that the proportion of filling stations that now sell unleaded petrol has increased from 50 to well over 90 per cent. in the year since the matter was debated in the Committee. There are still some filling stations, I think in rural areas, that do not sell unleaded petrol, but they are almost the only ones remaining.

The hon. Members for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) and for Halifax will be pleased to know that the quantity of lead emitted into the atmosphere has been reduced by over 70 tonnes a month. That reduction has been widely welcomed by environmental groups. For example, Miss Jane Dunmore, who may be known to the hon. Member for Halifax and who is the campaign director of CLEAR, the Campaign for Lead-Free Air has said:

"since the reduction in the amount of lead in petrol sold in Britain, the proportion of lead in the atmosphere has dropped by 50 per cent. Levels of lead in people's blood and in the air have dropped in the last two years."

Mr. Battle: Does the Minister agree that the figures that he gave are averages? In cities such as my city of Leeds there is a great contrast between inner-city areas where there are schools situated along the main roads and on the arterial accesses to the city. In those inner-city areas the lead levels are four to five times the levels in the areas beyond the ring roads. That is the real danger. If we base our arguments on average figures we could become very complacent about the problem.

Mr. Ryder: I agree with the hon. Gentleman The Government are not complacent or we would not be coming forward with the clause and nor would we have made such progress in the past few years. The hon. Gentleman is worried about lead in the air in his constituency. That is understandable and he is justified in being anxious. It is for that reason that we have set targets each year. Last year we were set a target of 30 per cent. by the hon. Member for Wrexham. We reached that target and, as I have said, we expect to reach 40 per cent. by the end of 1990.

Mr. Allen: The Minister says that he has set himself a target of 40 per cent. unleaded petrol usage for next year and has prayed in aid Miss Jane Dunmore of the Campaign for Lead-Free Air. I suggest that he reads the rest of what she said. She said:

"Some small savings in fuel and hence in pollution may result but the new waiver in favour of unleaded petrol is probably too slight to speed up greatly the pace of change."

Mr. Ryder: I do not think that anyone could quarrel about the pace of change, because the Government have reached a 30 per cent. target in three years. We are fourth in the European league table and, as I have said, we expect to improve from 30 to 40 per cent. by the end of this year. Nobody who looks at the figures for the last three years could say that the Government have not taken the matter extremely seriously. We shall continue to do so. We compare well with many other countries in the European Community. Only the West Germans, the Danes and the Dutch have a large market share of unleaded petrol, but those countries started well ahead of us in setting tax differentials between leaded and unleaded petrol.

Since last year's Budget, it has paid motorists to use unleaded petrol and many motorists who were able to switch to it have done so. But adjusting the price is not all that we have done to increase the take-up of unleaded petrol. Our measures last year made it more available and we also gave it a boost with a £1 million advertising campaign. My hon. Friend the Member for Wyre (Mr. Mans) mentioned that and also stressed the fact that many oil companies, notably Esso, BP and Shell, have helped by running massive advertising campaigns and promotions to encourage people to make the switch to unleaded. Car manufacturers have also played a role and I congratulate them and the oil companies for their part in the success that I have outlined to the Committee.

I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East that, from October this year, all new cars must be able to run on unleaded petrol. We do not believe that further increases in the duty differential would increase significantly the use of unleaded petrol. That would reduce the cost of unleaded petrol for those who have already made the switch and erode the real value of leaded petrol duty. There is a limit to the effect that a differential can have. As my hon. Friend said, about one quarter of all cars cannot run on unleaded petrol. In addition, many consumers are price-insensitive and there is nothing that the Government can do about that. Some drivers wrongly believe that leaded petrol gives better performance than unleaded petrol. However, tests by manufacturers and consumers associations show that this is not so.

Our having made the fiscal benefit available, it is now up to those who have not yet made the switch to do so. [Interruption.] I am pleased to welcome to the debate my hon. Friend the Minister for Roads and Traffic, who knows a great deal about this subject.

The differential that we are proposing is the right one to encourage more motorists to switch to unleaded petrol. The incentive is there and the Government would suffer a dead weight loss of tax if the differential were too great.

Therefore, I recommend that the Committee resists the Opposition's amendments. However, I give the assurance that in next year's Budget we shall look again at the differential, just as we have done during the past three years, and it is inconceivable that we would not take into account some of the arguments that have been put forward today and the desire of many people, irrespective of party, to see that we maintain the differential between leaded and unleaded petrol and increase the number of cars running on unleaded petrol.

Dr. Marek: We have had a useful debate and I thank my hon. Friends the Members for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew), for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), and for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) for their contributions. The Minister has made a reasonable response. He has honestly and forthrightly said that the Government hope to achieve a 40 per cent. take-up by the end of December. We shall remember that. I hope that that is well exceeded, as I am sure do hon. Members on both sides of the Committee.

However, we still think that the Government should have done something about unleaded petrol in this year's Budget. They have not done so because of the muddle between the Department of the Environment, the proposed White Paper which was supposed to tell us exactly what the Government's green policies will be and the Treasury being unable to act. However, it now transpires that the Treasury could have acted, since many proposals will not now be included in the White Paper because of the run-up to the next general election.

I recommend my right hon. and hon. Friends to press amendment No. 22 to a Division, but I beg to ask leave to withdraw amendment No. 33.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 22, in clause 3, page 2, line 23, leave out '£0·0299' and insert '£0·035'.—[Dr. Marek.]

Immigration Rules

10.14 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): I beg to move,

That the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (House of Commons Paper No. 251), a copy of which was laid before this House on 23 March, be disapproved.

We are to spend 90 minutes late at night debating immigration proposals that will have a profound and, in the Opposition's view, damaging effect on the lives of tens of thousands of British citizens. I propose to speak to the motion with all the speed and brevity that I can muster, as I know that several of my hon. Friends also wish to speak. I understand that the Home Secretary is to wind up the debate, so that he can deal properly with the points made by Opposition Members.

A number of points must be clarified. I think that we all agree that primary immigration into this country is largely over. The rules that we are to debate tonight, therefore, largely concern the enforced separation of British families living in Britain with British responsibilities and, I hope, British rights. We shall debate the case of husbands who are refused permisson to join their British wives; of elderly parents who are refused permission to join their British children; and of British children who, although wrongly excluded from this country, are nevertheless refused permission to join their parents.

Evidence now suggests that the regulations have also resulted in the intolerable treatment of young black and Asian British citizens who are in no sense immigrants, but who were born here and have lived here throughout their lives. I am sure that the Minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that each month in London about 250 overstayers are detected as a result of police vigilance. No one has any objection to that. However, I also understand that, each month, 200 British citizens are interviewed on suspicion of minor road traffic offences, and are then required to prove their immigration status, although it is—on the evidence—not in doubt.

Of course, those young men—British by birth and registration—are black. The only evidence that requires them to prove their nationality after being apprehended for a minor motoring offence is the colour of their skin. It is intolerable that colour should govern suspicion and investigation by the Metropolitan police. The blame attaches not to the police, but to a repressive immigration policy, about which I want to say four things.

First, the harsh immigration policy and regulations, as well as doing immense damage to the welfare and happiness of divided families, do perhaps irrevocable damage to community relations. The whole spirit of the regulations implies that the black and Asian British are a problem that will increase if husbands and wives are united, or if elderly parents are allowed to join their children. That alleged problem does not apply to wives whose origin is in the European Community.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Waddington): I hope that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) does not think that I am discourteous to interrupt him so early in his speech, but he has mentioned a series of matters connected with immigration law none of which has anything to do with tonight's debate.

We are debating four things tonight: the extension of the visa requirement; the admission of Commonwealth citizens with a grandparent born in Britain; the financial requirements for business men and people of independent means; and the admission of people with settled status. All the matters that the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned are important, but they have nothing to do with this debate.

Mr. Hattersley: I shall be content for you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to apply the rules of order. But I must point out to the Home Secretary that, knowing his tendencies, I inquired of the Table Office today whether all the contents of the "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules" were debatable on the motion. I was told that the nature of the motion meant that the entire contents of the document were possible for debate. But even were that not the case, though the Table Office assured me it was, everything that I have said up to now is directly related to the points——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The Home Secretary gave the four items with which the statement and motion pertaining to it are concerned. There are four restricted items which the Home Secretary announced to the House.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I raised this matter with Mr. Speaker earlier today. At that stage his advice was that this was a very narrow matter, and he said that the only matter with which we were concerned tonight was the adding of some countries to the visa list. That would not seem to be the case. The document "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules" covers the whole gamut of immigration procedures and rules, including, on page 19, the question of the political asylum of refugees.

I raised with Mr. Speaker today the question whether it would be in order tonight to raise the issue of 33 young Chinese who have been threatened with deportation from Britain to Panama. I raised that matter deliberately because, with the Home Secretary present tonight, I hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would report to the House why that extraordinary decision had been taken. I hoped that we would have the opportunity to press him to halt that threatened deportation until a judicial review of his decision had been considered by the courts.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am mystified by your ruling. We have been supplied by the Vote Office with a note on the changes that we are discussing, and it contains 14 items. That document has been distributed officially and is designed to help us with our business tonight. In any event, I should have thought that, as we are dealing with a "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules", it is in order to discuss changes that should, in our view, be included but which have been excluded. Surely that must be correct.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion is to disapprove the statement of changes and it is a narrow debate concerning only four items. It is not concerned with the question of asylum which the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) raised.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): Further to the point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. You will recall that in 1987, the House—wrongly, in my view—passed the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act. In that context, the issue of the admission of people to this country for political asylum relates to the question whether they have a visa to come here. As the instrument that we are discussing relates to visas, I should have thought that the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) was correct in that visas are necessary to enter from other countries to apply for asylum.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The visa requirements relate only to citizens of Morocco, Algeria and Tunisia and the scope of the debate relates to the desirability or otherwise of the proposed changes as in the motion.

Mr. Corbyn: But, Madam Deputy Speaker——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I am answering the hon. Member. The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) has the Floor:

Mr. Corbyn: Further to my point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am trying, with respect, to be helpful to you. You will be aware that on many occasions asylum seekers come through a third port. In other words, if a Chinese refugee or other asylum seeker came through Morocco, it should be in order to debate that matter tonight.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman should wait to be called before making that point.

Mr. Hattersley: It might be helpful if I continue dealing with two points that are specifically and explicitly dealt with in the statement of changes while those who advise you, Madam Deputy Speaker—of course, I defer to our judgment and ruling in all these particulars; it is not my way to argue with the Chair in general and with you in particular—consider whether it is possible, as we were advised, to suggest other changes that should be made in the regulations. That was the official advice that we were given today and while it is considered let me deal with two specific points.

A moment ago, Madam Deputy Speaker, you mentioned that one of the changes in the statement is the extension of visa requirements to four Maghreb countries. I hope that the Home Secretary will say in some detail not only why it is regarded necessary for British immigration policy that the visa requirements should be so extended, but how the decision to extend the visa requirements to those four countries came about.

As I understand it, it was a decision of the Trevi group comprising European Community Home Affairs and Interior Ministers. It is not an official body of the Community, meeting under the terms of Community legislation, but an informal group through which the Home Secretary and his counterparts in the Community reach common considerations about immigration and visa matters. May we be told why the Home Secretary agreed, before he came to the House, that that extension was necessary and why he thought it right to commit the United Kingdom to the extension of visa provisions to those Maghreb and Mashreq countries before he had considered it here in the House of Commons?

Let me also ask the Home Secretary about returning citizens. He will recall that, some weeks ago, the House debated Hong Kong. It was alleged that the object of the policy that the Government then proposed was to ensure that the citizens of Hong Kong had the right to come to Britain eventually, without having to come immediately.

As they are understood by all those organisations and authorities that have examined the narrow, precise and detailed changes in regulations that the Home Secretary has put before us this evening, the likely effect of those changes will be the opposite of that described during the debate on Hong Kong. It will require people to come here rather than lose the right to come here. It will induce prospective immigrants to return because, unless they return within a prescribed period, they will lose the opportunity to establish the right of permanent abode. I hope that the Home Secretary will deal with those specific matters.

I now turn to the changes that we regret have not been included in the statement. If, by such circumlocution, I am able to make those points within the rules of order, I propose to do so. First, we regret that the document does not include any alterations in the primary purpose rules. Opposition Members are all agreed that there must be some justification——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I regret to call the right hon. Gentleman to order, but the primary purpose rule is not included in the scope of the debate.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am genuinely puzzled about your ruling and seek advice. The motion on the Order Paper is:

"That the Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules (House of Commons Paper No. 251), a copy of which was laid before this House on 23rd March, be disapproved."

I have heard a number of items read out as being within order, but I see no reference to those items on the Order Paper. The Order Paper refers to House of Commons Paper No. 251, so I do not understand why that document in its entirety is not debatable.

Mr. Hattersley: Further to that point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am anxious to get on with the debate and to be helpful to you—[Interruption.] I understand the objections of some Conservative Members, but we are moving a motion to disapprove a statement of changes in immigration laws. I have in my hand the document entitled "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules". It so happens that the Government have also produced another document with the same title. With the greatest respect, I cannot for the life of me understand why my motion must apply to one document with that title but not to the other.

Mr. Waddington: I understand why the right hon. Gentleman is in error. We are concerned tonight with very minor rule changes—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] I am trying to help the House by clearing up a misapprehension on the part of the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members. It was thought that the House would find it convenient if we incorporated these minor changes in a reprinted, consolidated version of the complete rules. I should have thought that it is of help to the House, when minor changes are to be debated, for it to see where those minor changes fit into the rules that still stand. So it is as plain as a pikestaff that we are still debating minor changes, but for the convenience of the House we have presented a consolidated set of the rules.

Mr. Hattersley: I am sure that the Home Secretary is right in describing what he has done. I am interested not in what he has done but in what the House intends. The House is debating a motion disapproving the "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules". I repeat to you, Madam Deputy Speaker, that what I have in my hand is the "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules". That is what it is called. The word "Changes" appears. I would have assumed that everything that appeared within the cover labelled "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules" is appropriate for debate. I cannot contradict your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker, but the logic of my position, if not the Standing Orders on my position, is impeccable. [Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. We are in the middle of the debate. I want to be as helpful to the House as the two Front Bench spokesmen are trying to be. I think that the right hon. Gentleman should be allowed to continue.

Mr. Hattersley: I continue by referring to some of the things that we regret have not been included in the document. My statement of regret continues with the absence of a change in the primary purpose rule. We accept that there must be a check on the genuine as distinct from the bogus marriage, but we do not believe that that check can properly be applied by requiring an immigration officer to examine a prospective husband by asking questions that are open to ambiguity, and then making a judgment on what is going on in that man's mind and whether his answers imply a wish to marry the woman to whom he is engaged or a wish to come to this country. We would not be moving the motion to disapprove the changes with as much disagreement were such a suggestion not included.

Our second regret concerning omissions relates to those British citizens who should be in this country because they are the children of British parents. We have argued strongly over the last five years that a number of children who applied to come here and were denied the right to do so subsequently demonstrated by DNA tests that they were covered by the phrase "related as claimed". Despite the proof that they were the children of the parents they claimed to be children to, the Home Office wrongly excluded them.

A year ago, when we were having a debate, less interrupted by points of order, on the same subject and with the same width, the then Home Secretary said that young men and women who had applied to come here as children of British subjects, who were denied that right and who subsequently proved their relationship through DNA testing——

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. Will you ask the right hon. Gentleman to tell the House which rule refers to DNA testing?

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is not a point for the Chair; it is a point for debate if I were to call the hon. Member. [Interruption.] Order. The point the hon. Gentleman raised was not a point of order; it was a question for debate if he is called.

Mr. Hattersely: Because other hon. Members want to speak, I will press the Home Secretary briefly on his proposals for young men and women who are children of British citizens. who were wrongly excluded and who are not being allowed into this country. His predecessor promised in a debate a year ago that there would be a quick reassessment of their cases. According to parliamentary answers provided to my right hon. and hon. Friends, people excluded and then proved to be related as claimed are now waiting for as long as 20 and 24 months in Islamabad and Dhaka for re-examination. That seems intolerable to us and I hope that the Home Secretary will have an answer on how that process will be speeded up.

My third point, which is certainly covered by the rules, is the treatment of asylum seekers in several particulars. The Home Secretary will recall that paragraphs 173 and 174 of the document deal with that point. He will also recall that those paragraphs describe the way in which asylum seekers should be treated. There is now documented evidence that because of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Hattersley: There is now documented evidence that, because of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act, airlines themselves have begun to deport asylum seekers from the United Kingdom without any authority or legal justification. We now know that some weeks ago, British Airways discovered a number of Tamils travelling to this country on documents that would have been unacceptable to the Home Office. British Airways therefore——

Mr. Waddington: On a point of order Madam Deputy Speaker. I seek your guidance on this point—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Waddington: Would not it be correct, Madam Deputy Speaker, to say that I should be out of order if, in my reply, I were to deal with the treatment of asylum seekers because it has nothing to do with the proposed changes in immigration rules?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am looking at the "Statement of Changes in Immigration Rules" and I find that paragraphs 173 and 174 refer to asylum. However, I must tell the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) that they do not concern changes in the rules.

Mr. Hattersley: As I tried, with perhaps some success, to do a moment ago, I am describing another change which, if it were included, might tempt us to vote in favour of the regulations. I must say through you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to the Home Secretary that I have never seen a more pathetic display than the right hon. and learned Gentleman being desperately anxious not to answer questions that are vital to the reputation of this country and to the welfare of people here.

I want to conclude so that my hon. Friends can make their points. There is another change which, if it were included in the subsidiary document, might tempt us to feel more sympathetic towards the proposals. I repeat that a number of Tamils came to this country. British Airways judged that they did not possess documents that would allow them to enter the country according to Home Office regulations. British Airways manhandled the Tamils on to an aeroplane and sent them back by main force to the country from which they had come, thus preventing them as asylum seekers even from enjoying the right of appeal which the primary and principal document says is theirs by right. When cross-examined on that, BA said that it could not possibly observe the rules of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act, that it could see no reason why it should pay £1,000 a time for every man who travelled on its airline in a way in which it would be impossible for it to detect and that the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act was therefore unworkable.

I repeat that if this change in the immigration rules involved a more acceptable system for dealing with men and women who come for asylum and who are, at present, improperly and, I believe, illegally excluded by airlines operating independently as if they were able to do so in the manner of the Home Secretary, those of us who will vote against the immigration rules changes would not do so with the same enthusiasm.

I do not deny for a second that tonight the Home Secretary has achieved part of his purpose in diverting some of the criticism that would have been made by the Opposition about the immigration rules. I congratulate him on putting up this smokescreen around an unacceptable policy. However, since he has behaved in this extraordinary way, I must tell him that there are other ways open to us in which we can debate these matters properly—and I promise him: debate these matters properly we shall.

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): I have examined the changes in the rules, with great care and I am bound to say that any fair-minded person reading the changes would not find much to quarrel with. Why therefore do the Opposition make such a song and dance about them? Is it because their policy on immigration is almost an open door which would allow everyone to come here, or is it because the Opposition feel that at present they must oppose everything that the Government propose?

I believe that we are a wonderfully fair country. We stick to the rules, unlike some foreign Governments. Why therefore are the Opposition trying to pillory the Government, who have been extremely fair, now that they want to make some small changes in the rules?

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Give way.

Sir John Stokes: If I may be forgiven, I will not give way. Many hon. Members want to speak and a great deal of time has already been used up, yet the debate has hardly started.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East) rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is obviously not giving way.

Sir John Stokes: I have attended many debates on immigration and the immigration rules in the 20 years that I have been a Member of this place. In debates of this kind,

[Sir John Stokes]

I have always been struck forcibly by how much Labour and Liberal Members have distanced themselves from the feelings of ordinary people.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I am confused. My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was told on several occasions that this was not a wide-ranging debate and obviously, like all Opposition Members, he accepted your ruling. However, the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes) is talking about immigration in general and Britain's response. Is that in order?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure that the hon. Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes) is just warming up and that he will come to his point any moment now.

Sir John Stokes: That is exactly what I am trying to do and I will do so if I am allowed to get on with my speech.

In so far as the small changes in the rules reduce the flow of immigration to this country, they will be welcomed whole-heartedly by the British public. We must be careful to respect the views of the people who elected us to this place. Despite all the legislation and the rules, large numbers of people are still entering this country for settlement every year. It is true that there is some attempt to stop primary immigration, but thousands are still entering this country as relatives or for other reasons.

Mr. Turner rose——

Sir John Stokes: What we have heard so far from Opposition Members and the way in which they have intervened in the debate so frequently will worry and alarm many people, including many Labour supporters. The rules are reasonable and necessary. British citizenship should be a most valuable prize for anyone and it should not be granted lightly to all and sundry. I welcome the changes—small though they are—although I wish that they could have gone further.

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): I feel a little unsure because I had wanted to congratulate the Home Secretary first on going to the trouble of consolidating the immigration rules. From the point of view of practitioners —be they professional people or advice workers—it is helpful to have a single set of rules. Secondly, enormous changes have taken place in the running of Lunar house. It has become more efficient and quicker. People there are now accessible on the telephone and there has been a complete change in the management. I am not saying that it is perfect or that I agree with the decisions that are made there—they are not always even—but there has certainly been a change.

At that point, the plaudits cease because one can compare trying to seek entry into the United Kingdom with trying to climb a rock face. It is a slow and difficult process and just when the applicant or immigrant gets to the final ledge, the changes in the immigration rules are the stamping on the fingers that push the applicant back down the abyss. That happens time and time again. It happened under the existing rules and under the primary purpose rule. The European Court of Human Rights held that the rules were sexist because they applied to men. The Government had a chance to liberalise the immigration rules, but what did they do? They stamped on the fingers of those who might have got into this country by changing the rules to have "equal misery" and apply the monstrous primary purpose rule to both men and women alike.

Just when West African students were beginning to find a way through the immense practical difficulties of getting an education in this country, the immigration rules were changed. Again, there was stamping on fingers and it is now impossible for people from many West African countries to come here as visitors and to change their status to student. Just when people were beginning to win deportation appeals on the grounds that there were compassionate circumstances why they should not be deported, the Government again effectively changed the rules to deny them any appeal—subject to the case of Oladahinde in which I have an interest. That has happened again under these rules.

The history of the immigration rules is almost the history of allowing people to drown within sight of shore. Indeed, they should no longer be called "immigration" rules; "exclusion" rules would describe their purpose much more accurately. We come to that again——

Mr. John Carlisle (Luton, North) rose——

Mr. Fraser: No, I cannot give way to the hon. Gentleman tonight because we are so short of time.

At the moment, it is impossible for someone who is established here to bring his or her aged parents to the United Kingdom unless the parents are wholly or mainly dependent on the children in the United Kingdom. If they are dependent, but have an income of less than £15,000 per year or less than £150,000 in capital, they cannot settle in the United Kingdom. Nevertheless, some people save up and wait until they receive their pension or annuity from abroad and then seek to come to the United Kingdom —not to be a burden on this country, but to be with their children. But once again, their fingers are stamped on and the rungs are taken out of the ladder. Indeed, the £150,000 requirement has been unnecessarily raised to £200,000. That can have been done only with the intention of excluding people from this country and by not treating sons and daughters with compassion.

The same is true for those people who might have been able to establish businesses here, and be useful and provide employment, which is one of the conditions of establishing oneself as self-employed. Again, the rungs have been cut from the ladder by revising the rule for establishing businesses in the United Kingdom and by increasing the capital requirement to £200,000.

However, the worst aspect of the rules is the change affecting returning residents. It is not a minor change in the rules and it is not intended simply to restate the existing law; it is a change of substance. I should like to give the Home Secretary an example that I have raised with his private office, which, on that occasion, was helpful. This could happen to many people. I have a friend, an Australian lady, who is aged about 80. She has lived in this country for between 30 and 40 years, but has never gone to the trouble of changing from being an Australian citizen to being a citizen of the United Kingdom.

When she was about 79, she lost her old passport, but she got a new Australian passport and then went to France for a short time. When she returned, her passport was stamped "six months entry", not "returning resident". She paid no heed to that because, having spent most of her life in this country, where her children are established, she thought that she had every right to remain here. But she had on her passport a stamp that said six months. Under the changed rules, she would not, on her previous return to the United Kingdom, come as a returning resident and, at the age of 80 and in those circumstances—she was flying from Australia—she could have been sent back to Australia.

A second example—these are all real examples—involves a friend of mine who is a doctor and has established himself in this country.

Ms. Short: As I understand the new rules, they say that if people do not ask for returning resident status and receive a temporary status, that is it—they have lost their permanent status for ever. In the example given by my hon. Friend, I understand that he sought the help of the Home Secretary's private office. If the new rules were in place, the Home Secretary's private office would not be able to help.

Mr. Fraser: That is exactly my point.

My second case is that of someone who practises as a doctor in the United Kingdom and has indefinite leave to remain here. Under a scheme of assistance, he goes, with the blessing of the British Council, to a Third-world country to practise medicine there, dealing with poor people and trying to save their eyesight. The term of the contract is three years. He returns every year, but he no longer has a home here. The Home Secretary will appreciate that, if someone is away from the United Kingdom for more than one year, it is impossible to apply for naturalisation as a United Kingdom citizen, because one has to be here for the year preceding the date of the application. In those circumstances it could be said that a doctor who is established and has indefinite leave to remain in the United Kingdom is not coming back for the purpose of settlement, but only for the purpose of residence. That is another substantial change in the rules.

[Mr. Fraser]

A third example involves someone under the age of 18, who is too young to be naturalised in his or her own right as a United Kingdom citizen, takes a university course —it does not matter whether it is in the United States or West Africa—and goes away for three years, instead of two. They would find it impossible to come back as returning residents, even if they had a short holiday here in the meantime.

Time and time again people who have spent most of their lives in this country, severed all links with overseas countries, sold their properties and abandoned their homes will find themselves suddenly excluded from the United Kingdom by virtue of the change of rules. If that is not stamping on the fingers of the innocent, I do not know what is.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): I have been looking at the statement of changes in immigration rules, and of the 15 changes that are listed in the explanatory note issued by the Home Office, there are only four, perhaps five, of substance.

I was greatly saddened by the speech of the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) which, as far as I can see, was largely out of order. However, I can understand how the mistake was made. I found, when issued with the explanatory note, that it came from the Vote Office with a complete set of the immigration rules—inasmuch as they are covered by document 251. But it is clear from many of the speeches made this evening, that there is a desire to discuss immigration issues in the broader context, including those of refugee status, so perhaps it would be an idea for the Opposition to——

Mr. Hattersley: On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. The hon. Gentleman talks about the two documents which, I think, will be the subject of some discussion as the weeks go on. He referred to the document that came from the Vote Office. That document comes from the Home Office. We have not reached the point of elective tyranny when we are required to debate documents produced by Government Ministries, as distinct from the documents that have statutory force. It is the other document that has statutory force.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That was an explanation rather than a point of order.

Mr. Hanley: I am surprised at the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook. I was trying to say that I could understand how the error had been made by his advisers. If he wants to debate immigration, he can take every opportunity to introduce a debate on the subject of immigration on the next Supply day. Tonight we are dealing with the changes in immigration rules that we have before us. The right hon. Gentleman's protestations can easily be given expression within the next few days on the next Supply day, when he can speak at great length on any subject he likes.

We are discussing a number of small changes. I should have thought that three of them would have been welcomed by the Opposition. First, in 1986, the rules were changed to prevent the admission of child spouses. I do not believe that the Opposition support the idea of child spouses—if they do, perhaps one of their number should say so. This change means that no longer can a child in Britain go abroad and marry under rules that may be legal in another country and then return to this country in a married state. I find it amazing that the Opposition's absence of comment on that subject suggests that they believe that the change is wrong. By voting against the order, they are removing protection for children who may go abroad and be forced to marry under the age of consent——

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman seems misinformed about procedures of this House. Just because we agree with part of a measure and disagree with other significant parts of it does not mean that we do not vote against it. The hon. Gentleman must have been in that situation himself. Opposition Members do not believe that children should be able to go abroad to marry, and none of us has said that. The hon. Gentleman's remarks are mischievous, and he must know it.

Mr. Hanley: The hon. Lady is being ingenuous, and clearly did not listen to the speech of her right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook——

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): "Disingenuous", surely.

Mr. Hanley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. Knowing the fees that he charges for his legal advice, I hope that he will not be sending me a large bill in the morning.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook could at least have dwelt on the changes that are being made. The one that I have mentioned is important, as it protects children in this country. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) may believe that that is only a minor change, but since it is one of only four changes of substance, I am surprised by her opinion.

The second change concerns Commonwealth citizens who can prove that one of their grandparents was born in the United Kingdom, and who return to this country, are admitted for four years and then leave again. I seem to recall that the Opposition have regularly regarded patrials with scorn, believing that there was some sort of white-man link with those with grandparents in this country.

I can remember major speeches by Opposition spokesmen saying that we should tighten up the rules on patrials because they favoured white over black. Perhaps historically they have done so—I certainly do not favour whites over blacks in this respect—so the rule is being tightened to stop its abuse, from which so many whites have benefited in the past. So the Opposition should support the second change, too.

Thirdly, the Opposition have often said that the privileges granted to business people settling in this country constitute an abuse. Merely because the Government are increasing the financial limits from £150,000 to £200,000—by the rate of inflation—all the old arguments are being trotted out again, but this time from a rather strange direction. Surely the Opposition should support this third change, because it favours business people. They should support three, at least, of the four major changes in these rules.

The next change is merely a clarification of the provision for returning residents, and it is therefore perhaps not treated as a change of substance. The Opposition manage to find a reason for opposing that change, which is for clarification and not a change of substance.

The fifth change is one of substance because it will require visas for people from Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia. It is fair to establish visa controls as long as there is mutual agreement about them between the countries involved. They are the best way to control immigration fairly, so that those who properly qualify to come here or to leave this country to visit other countries can do so. Such controls make sure that people have the right qualifications for travel.

That is the only change of substance that the Opposition can get on their high horse and vote against. By voting against the change, either the Opposition want to play the race card, which is sad, or they are blowing up out of all proportion the changes to existing immigration rules for their own party purposes. That is also sad.

I should like to see future contributions in the debate kept to changes in immigration rules. I hope that people outside, whether they are black or white and wherever they come from, will recognise that these are not major changes resulting from prejudice. They clarify existing law, correct minor spelling mistakes in the legislation and largely introduce the sort of changes that the Opposition have been demanding.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): If anyone is trying to play the race card, it is clearly the Government, who have moved the amendment relating to grand-patrials. The idea that grand-patrials will be allowed a right of residence here for only four years is designed to remove from the immigrant list a substantial number of white people, and that will expose people from the Indian sub-continent to greater pressure. It seems to be done for no other reason, but if the Minister has any other reason, we look forward to hearing it.

I welcome the consolidation of the rules. I cannot understand how it could seriously be argued that the document before us is not the document that we are here to debate. The title and the number of the document are on the Order Paper and it is extraordinary for the Home Secretary to try to argue anything else. It is of a piece with his argument that these are slight changes. The suggestion that the rule relating to returning residents is slight does not stand a moment's scrutiny. It will work extraordinary hardship in a large number of cases, and it must be amended.

It is of course right that we should have a wide-ranging debate on immigration as soon as possible. That lies within the power of the Home Secretary and the Official Opposition; I hope that we can have such a debate, because there are many matters that I should like to raise. However, in this short debate, I do not wish to take up the time of the House by dealing with them.

I have asked many questions about the extraordinary use of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987 to enable British Airways to act as an immigration officer. I have had the most astonishing revelations about the countries involved and the numbers of people who have been turned away since the Act was introduced. It is an unsatisfactory way to implement the law. However, that matter is not the primary purpose of the debate, which is about the specific changes that are being made.

I go along with the Home Secretary's desire for a one-and-a-half-hour debate. That is the best that we can hope for. There is only one respect in which Thatcher's Britain resembles heaven, and it is that it is easier for a camel to enter the eye of a needle than for someone from the Indian sub-continent to enter this country.

Mr. Hanley: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his generosity. Since the Government came to power, more than 500,000 people have been granted permanent citizenship in the United Kingdom, of which three quarters have come from the Indian sub-continent. That cannot be a record of racism.

Mr. Maclennan: The hon. Gentleman has raised a point that would be more suitable in the debate that we are all looking forward to.

I have just come hot foot from the Committee which is considering the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill, and I am rather surprised at one of the provisions that we are debating, which requires particular clarification from the Home Secretary. How are British dependent territories citizens from Hong Kong to interpret the amendment affecting returning residents?

The Government are giving contradictory indications. On the one hand, they are trying to encourage dependent territories citizens to remain in Hong Kong, while on the other, paragraph 9 of the statement of charges makes it abundantly clear that they do not enjoy the rights of British overseas citizens and so will have to establish their rights of residence here by returning from Hong Kong under the provisions of paragraph 58. That is a most disturbing development. When that becomes widely known in Hong Kong, it will run counter to the Government's declared policy of retaining stability of population there. The Home Secretary should deal with that matter tonight.

The hon. Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) described the provisions for returning residents as clarification, but they are a clear reversal of the law as it has been established in a number of cases before the immigration tribunal. The present rule is simple, clear and easily applied. It is that people settled here in the United Kingdom are allowed to go abroad for up to two years without losing their settled status. Two new conditions will now apply.

First, the person returning must seek admission for the purpose of settlement. That means that someone who has been normally resident here, who interrupts that residence to go abroad for whatever purpose must, when coming back, declare that it is his intention to remain settled here, despite the fact that he may be making only a short visit to see a sick parent or to deal with some business matter. Innumerable practical cases of hardship will arise as a result of that change. How it can be described as a clarification is simply beyond imagination.

The second leg of the change is that it must also be established that the returning person had indefinite leave to remain when he last left the United Kingdom. That will also seriously restrict the operation of the returning residents rule.

The reality is that that will have a grave effect on the practical working of the rule. The intention to settle is extremely difficult to establish. It is rather like the primary purpose rule. It is to do with a state of mind. It is almost inviting people who come back to Britain to misrepresent their innocent reasons for coming for a short time so that they will not be deprived of their right to residence. That cannot be right.

That is the most serious change that the Home Secretary has made, and it is very worrying. It will lead to innumerable cases of hardship, which cannot be his intention. Surely that should be avoided.

11.9 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): I represent a constituency in which about 20 per cent. of the population have Asian connections. In studying the statement of changes, I did so as someone who would not vote for a measure that materially disadvantaged any of my constituents. I refer to the changes to the rules, not the consolidation measures with which the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) tried to divert the House. It does not matter whether the right hon. Gentleman was in order—the fact remains that he tried to divert the attention of the House from the real subject of the debate.

The source of problems for my Asian constituents is the uncertainty surrounding some of the technical aspects of the immigration rules, which are open to different interpretation. It is not just that I cannot be sure whether an immigrant coming to my advice bureau has a good or bad case to make, because lawyers and the United Kingdom Immigrant Advisory Service are also not necessarily able to state whether a particular case is 100 per cent. sound. That uncertainty needs to be swept away.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) said, the package before us is of little or no substance, and it introduces only minor changes that will give people some confidence in interpreting the immigration rules. Is it unreasonable that the changes concerning money limits should take account of inflation over the past seven years? Is it unreasonable that a spelling mistake or some other genuine error should be corrected? As to illegal immigrants or overstayers, is it unreasonable for my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary to seek clarification and certain changes?

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes put a fair question to the Opposition concerning child spouses which they must answer. It is no use saying, "There are other matters in here, and this isn't really what we meant." My hon. Friend made a significant point concerning child spouses and the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook should answer it.

Mr. Hattersley: The last publicised account of child spouses concerned two young children from my constituency who were abducted and, in my view, falsely married in Yemen. When I fought for them to be returned to this country, I was urged by the Foreign Secretary not to behave in a way that would undermine Britain's relationship with the Government of that country.

Mr. Hughes: The right hon. Gentleman's remarks are interesting and revealing. It is right for him to raise that important matter on behalf of his constituents. However, the right hon. Gentleman knows, as do other right hon. and hon. Members and the public, that it has nothing to do with the measure before the House.

I shall make matters clearer, so that the Opposition can understand them. The present rules do not prevent a child settled in this country from marrying abroad and returning with his or her spouse. That is being changed—which has nothing to do with the point made by the right hon. Gentleman, and he knows it.

We must ask the Labour party: is it on the side of illegal immigrants and overstayers? They are the subject of the only change to the rules that is of any real substance.

Mr. Hattersley: I do not even have to ask the hon. Gentleman to think back to the Yemeni false marriage of six months ago. Forty minutes ago, I said in my speech —before the Home Secretary ruled me out order—that none of us would complain that cases of overstayers detected by the police being sent back to their country. That is in Hansard. If the hon. Gentleman had done me the courtesy of listening to my speech, he would not have asked his absurd question.

Mr. Hughes: I am extremely grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his clarification. What he had to say to the House about the two matters that contain any substance is that he is not against those, but he is voting against the rules on other spurious grounds.

Mr. Hattersley rose—

Mr. Hughes: I have given way to the right hon. Gentleman often enough and other hon. Members wish to speak in the debate.

Why has the Labour party brought this matter to the House? I hope that the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook is as good as his word and that we shall have a more wide-ranging debate—not about immigration but about race relations. That is the key issue and it is what affects my constituents. They want to know what hon. Members on both sides of the House have to say about the important issues that affect people of Asian origin in this country. They want to know about racial harassment and what can be done about it. They want to know about the issues that affect their families.

Why was this issue raised? I think that the right hon. Gentleman answered that question when he referred to Hong Kong. During the debates on Hong Kong no one could be in any doubt that the Labour party's stance on the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill, as stated by the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook, was designed to appeal to what they regard as racist Labour voters in the inner cities. They were playing the race card. The number of Labour abstentions and sheepish looks showed that many Labour Members of Parliament knew exactly what they were doing.

All the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and his party are trying to do tonight is to play the other side of the coin. Now they are trying to say that they are on the side of Asian-British people, despite the racist stance that they took a couple of weeks ago. I do not think that that is going to wash with Asian-British people. They will not be very impressed with what the Labour party has had to say.

My constituents and other Asian people in this country will welcome this minor package because, once again, they will be able to trust that what the Government say is what they mean, that fair rules will be applied fairly and rules that are unfair will be clarified. Therefore, when the Government consider the case of someone trying to enter the country, or whether a person's status allows him or her to stay, people will know that the rules are fair and will be applied fairly. People would not be able to say that that would be the case under a Labour Government, and that has been proved yet again tonight.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): The primary purpose rule has been referred to in the debate, and the Home Secretary should recognise the heartbreak caused by it. It is almost impossible for people to get round it if they are trying to answer honestly questions that they are asked in connection with the rule.

The Home Secretary should understand immigration because of the ministerial offices that he has held. You will know that, Madam Deputy Speaker, because you were a candidate in the Nelson and Colne by-election when the Home Secretary was elected for that constituency, and he had to deal with immigration problems there.

The primary purpose rule causes serious problems and the Government must deal with it at some stage.

As regards visas, it is time that the Government and officials stopped judging people who require visas to enter Britain as though they wanted not just to visit but to become permanent residents. We all recognise that the three additions referred to in the rules are a result of the French connection whereby people can come through in a different direction. That suspicion on the part of the Government and officials makes it difficult for many people who genuinely wish to visit this country to obtain a visa.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) referred to DNA testing. Applications by dependants should be dealt with as speedily as possible. As for those who are no longer dependants, if DNA tests prove that a mistake was made in the past, they should be allowed to come to the United Kingdom.

As for the increase in capital from £150,000 to £200,000 and in incomes from £15,000 to £20,000, I do not believe that these people should be allowed to come to this country under a different set of rules. An income of £20,000 is reasonable, but if people in Bangladesh or Pakistan want to come here and have capital of £150,000 or £200,000, they are extremely wealthy compared with the majority of people in those countries. Wealthy minorities should not be treated differently from the overwhelming number of people who apply to come to the United Kingdom. That is unjust. The rules should be fair. We want justice, but we do not have it.

The Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. David Waddington): I hope that the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) did not think it discourteous of me to interrupt him. I had only one motive — to establish the parameters of the debate and to make sure that I knew what was the Chair's ruling on the width of the debate. We now know precisely what the position is. There is no doubt whatsoever, if we compare the consolidated rules with the previous rules, that we are dealing with minor rule changes.

Despite what the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) said, there is no link between these changes and the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill. The rules apply worldwide, they are not aimed at Hong Kong, they do not bear particularly on residents in the colony and they do not conflict with the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Bill. However, I shall deal with rule 58, which is worrying the right hon. Gentleman.

Only three of the changes will have any effect on our practices or procedures. The first is the change in visa requirements. There is the new visa requirement for nationals of Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia. It came into effect on 1 April, and it applies to nationals of those countries, other than those settled here and returning after a short absence abroad. Visitors and students, along with those seeking work or settlement, have to make their case for admission at a United Kingdom mission abroad rather than at a port of entry, and those who do not qualify avoid the disappointment, expense and inconvenience of being refused entry after their journey here.

The change certainly brings the United Kingdom into line with the majority, though by no means all, of our European Community partners. The majority—Belgium, France, Germany, Ireland, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Portugal, and Greece for Algeria alone—also now require visas. The change became necessary for us because of the operational difficulties that were created at the ports by the arrival of an increasing number of people from the Maghreb who did not meet the requirements of the rules.

I am glad to say that the new arrangements have been very successful. The difficulties at our ports have been resolved, which has enabled us to provide a better service for bona fide travellers, and there is at present no delay in dealing with visa applications abroad: they are all being decided within 24 hours. I commend the staff involved for the excellent job that they are doing.

In the near future, we shall be making two further changes to our visa requirements. My hon. Friend the Member for Hove (Mr. Sainsbury), the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, reported to the House on 16 February that, during talks that had just taken place with representatives of the Argentine Government, it had been agreed that each country should soon abolish visa requirements relating to the other country's nationals, and on 9 April a visa abolition agreement was duly signed. It is due to come into force on 8 June.

Mr. Hattersley: Where on this little piece of paper is Argentina dealt with? I should also like to know the position of citizens of, say, Tunisia who—this applies to many—are also French citizens, thus having dual nationality. Will they be allowed in automatically, under EC rules, or will they still need a visa?

Mr. Waddington: If they present French passports that appear to be valid, they will be allowed in like any other French citizen. If they present Algerian passports, they will be treated as Algerian citizens, and thus be subject to the visa requirement. Surely that is logical. I think that, when dealing with the three new visa requirements, it was helpful of me to remind the House of the Argentine arrangements.

Another visa change relates to the German Democratic Republic. As my hon. Friend the Member for Warwickshire, North (Mr. Maude)—the Minister of State —announced on 9 May, Foreign Ministers of the European Community countries agreed at a meeting in Brussels on 7 May that all member states would abolish their visa requirements for that country. The United Kingdom welcomed that agreement, because we no longer see any need—on grounds of security or immigration control—for East Germans to obtain visas, and we now intend to negotiate a reciprocal visa abolition agreement with the GDR. No date for the lifting of visas was set at the meeting of Foreign Ministers, and we shall lay an amendment as soon as possible to remove the visa requirement for East Germans.

[Mr. Waddington]

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): I appreciate that an important principle lies behind what the Home Secretary has said; changing international circumstances require the adaptation of visa requirements. Will he, however, consider another application of the same basic humanitarian rule?

An international change involving one of my constituents is the civil war in Somalia. One of the by-products of that war is the incidence of orphans, who —according to Somali rules—become the responsibility of the nearest male relative. In this instance, the nearest male relative happens to live in Cardiff, West.

One consequence of such developments is not covered by the regulations, although I do not think that a major change would be required to deal with it. May I ask the Home Secretary to consider these people as sympathetically as the European Foreign Ministers considered GDR nationals, now that it is assumed that German reunification will not be long delayed?

As I have told the Home Secretary in writing several times, my constituent and others like him are already taking financial responsibility, according to the iron rules of the Somalis. After all, in this country we are trying to encourage "care in the community"; the Somalis already practise it, but in their present form the regulations do not permit dependent orphan relatives to be brought here.

Mr. Waddington: As the hon. Gentleman knows, many Somalian citizens have been admitted to this country and granted refugee status. The best advice that I can give him is this: if he will write to me about a specific case, I shall decide whether, on exceptional grounds, the person concerned should be treated as a member of the family of the person who has been admitted as a refugee. This can be dealt with only case by case. If the hon. Gentleman writes to me, I will look into the matter.

Ms. Short: The situation in Somalia is truly dreadful. People are starving. There is a special unit in the Home Office dealing with these issues, and I have found the people in that unit extremely helpful in assisting relatives of my constituents. Is a tightening up taking place? Has there been a change recently? Up to now I have found the Home Office helpful and generous in these tragic cases. There is a suggestion that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is about to tighten the rules for Somalian refugees. Is that correct?

Mr. Waddington: I know of no change. Apparently there has been no change in practice for those in refugee camps. The hon. Lady may have a case concerning others. If she writes to me, I will look into the matter. I know of no formal change in the situation, but there may have been some slight difference in some of the recent rulings, simply because of different reports coming to the Home Office and the Foreign Office about the situation there. I will look into that for the hon. Lady.

The second of the main changes in the package before us tonight concerns the admission of Commonwealth citizens with a grandparent born in the United Kingdom who wish to take or seek work here. This change will not prevent people of United Kingdom descent coming here as before. It will mean that, when they first arrive, they will be given leave to enter the country for a limited period and they will qualify for settled status if they stay here in that capacity for four years. The change brings this provision into line with the arrangements for others, such as work permit holders and business men who qualify for settlement only after four years working here.

Ms. Short: I am not that critical of this proposal, but why does it apply only to Commonwealth citizens? This change will not apply to South Africans, who are probably the majority arriving in this category. Why has the Home Secretary exempted South Africans, for example?

Mr. Waddington: The existing rule, the hon. Lady will remember, refers only to Commonwealth citizens who can prove that they have a grandparent who was born in this country. The only change we are making is that, whereas at present anybody who arrives at our ports and can show that he has a grandparent who was born in this country will be granted immediate settlement, under these rules he will not get settlement until he has served in this country the same time as a work permit holder must serve before he gets settlement. It is a logical change, because there is little point in granting settlement to somebody who presents himself at a port saying that he has a United Kingdom grandparent but has no intention of settling in Britain permanently but merely wishes to come for a short visit or perhaps to work for a year or so.

The third of the main changes in the rules concerns the financial requirements for businessmen and persons of independent means. A person coming here to establish himself in business or to be self-employed must invest his own capital in that business, in addition to meeting a number of other requirements which include the creation of new employment here. A person of independent means must have either a capital sum or an income available here to support himself and his family, as well as showing that he has a close personal connection with the United Kingdom or that his admission is in the United Kingdom's general interests.

The general structure of the criteria for admission in these categories remains unaltered. The new rules, however, increase the minimum investment required by business men to £200,000 and the capital sum or income required by persons of independent means to £200,000 in the first case and £20,000 a year in the other. Previously, the financial requirements were an investment or capital sum of £150,000, or an income of £15,000 a year. The amounts have not been raised since 1983, and the changes broadly restore the levels to their 1983 value. I can tell the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser) that there is nothing sinister behind the change—it is a rather belated uprating of the qualifying sum to take account of the decline in the value of money over the relevant years.

It is clearly necessary to increase the limits from time to time to maintain the effectiveness of the rules and to ensure that a substantial investment is made by people securing admission as business men and that persons of independent means have sufficient funds to support themselves and their dependants.

The changes in the provisions on returning residents in paragraph 58 worried the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland and seem to have caused some quite unnecessary concern inside and outside the House. However, they are no more than minor amendments to make clear what was always understood to be the position, until a determination of the immigration appeals tribunal cast doubt on the matter, and to restate what the High Court has decided was the correct view.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Home Secretary give way?

Mr. Waddington: I think that it would be helpful if I explained what the change is. I can assure the House that the paragraph does not in any way affect adversely the position of people who being ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom travel abroad and then after a temporary absence wish to resume their residence here.

The old rule referred to a returning resident being admitted for settlement if he had had indefinite leave to remain when he left. That was always taken to mean, "when he left for the absence from which he was returning". Surprisingly, the tribunal held differently—that a person could claim to be a returning resident on the basis that, at some time in the past, he had had indefinite leave to remain, even if subsequently he had come here temporarily and had had one or more grants of limited leave. The new rule clears up the matter by referring to when he "last" left.

The other change arises from the fact that, although the old rule was clearly about admission for settlement, it did not state explicitly that, in order to be admitted for settlement under the rule, one had to be seeking entry for the purpose of settlement. It did not state it explicitly, but clearly that was the rule's whole purpose. It was intended to allow persons resident here to resume residence after an absence of two years. It was not intended to enable people resident overseas to maintain settled status in the United Kingdom by paying short visits once every two years when they had no real intention of resuming residence here. The position is now made clear beyond peradventure.

Mr. Corbyn: Will the Home Secretary consider the position of people from a country of political turmoil, such as Chile was in the past, who did not apply for political asylum but received permanent resident status here in exile, and then returned to Chile or wherever they were from? If the situation in that country deteriorated again, they would seek to return here as the place where they could live with some safety. In those circumstances, would they be forced to apply for asylum, which they would not want to do as they had never done that, or would they be forced to go through the whole process of applying for permanent residence here as if they were first-time arrivals?

Mr. Waddington: Having followed the case which the hon. Gentleman raised, I cannot see any difficulty or injustice. The hon. Gentleman is positing that someone came here to seek political refuge, but no longer needed political refuge here because the position in his own country was restored to normality. He then returned to that normal country, as there was no need for him to remain here as a refugee. If, subsequently, the conditions in his own country deteriorate, the question obviously arises whether that deterioration is so grave that he is entitled to take refuge in this country again. I can therefore see no injustice whatsoever in his leaving this country, going back to his normal country, resuming residence in that country, and having to seek leave once again to come back here.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Home Secretary see no injustice in the case of someone who has been resident in this country for a substantial number of years, who is required to go abroad to look after an indigent or dying relative, who interrupts his stay abroad to come back to deal with his affairs on a temporary basis, before returning to look after his relative, losing his long-established right of residence? That cannot be fair.

Mr. Waddington: It is a question whether he was resident in this country before he left. If his settled home was in this country and he went for a visit abroad, there should be no difficulty in his re-admission. That is the whole misunderstanding. What many of the people who are worried about the change seem to be arguing for is not a provision for returning residence, but a new status of perpetual, permanent residence to be open to someone who has his permanent home elsewhere and who makes a fleeting visit here once every two years. That did not seem to be the sort of case to which the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland was referring.

Ms. Abbott: Is the Secretary of State aware that many thousands of people affected by the change of rule will be pensioners who have spent all their working lives in this country and who may have to leave here for extended periods to deal with death and illness? They will find that, unknown to them, they have lost what they assumed was a permanent right of residence. I know many people, including my own uncles and aunts, who have been in this country for 30 or 40 years and who have held on to their Jamaican passports out of sentimentality.

They assumed that they had a sustained right of residence if they came back here within two years. Many of them will have relatives in America and Jamaica. They may well spend over two years away from here winding up the affairs of relatives, and they will have lost their right to residence through the change in the rules. It is not a minor change in the rules. It is a major change which will bring misery and confusion to people who have spent all their working lives in this country.

Mr. Waddington: I can reassure the hon. Lady. She has overlooked paragraph 59, which deals with the very situation to which she refers. I will come to it in a moment.

Mr. Fraser: The Home Secretary has referred to paragraph 59. If he looks at paragraph 49, he will see that, if somebody comes to this country for settlement and does not have a special voucher or prior entry clearance, that person is to be refused entry. Is the Home Secretary saying that paragraph 59 is an exception to paragraph 49?

Mr. Waddington: No, because paragraph 59 has nothing to do with paragraph 49. Paragraph 49 deals with the admission of people with special vouchers. Paragraph 59 deals with when a returning resident should be admitted. It says plainly that, even if a person has been abroad and resumed residence elsewhere, that person may still be re-admitted here as a returning resident if he has spent most of his life here. That was precisely the case being raised by the hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott).

These cases rarely cause any difficulty. A person seeking re-admission as a returning resident within two years of having had settled status here should normally be re-admitted without further inquiry. We propose to reinforce the message that there is going to be no change in practice by issuing a specific instruction to immigration officers emphasising that in these cases it will not normally be necessary to make any further inquiries about the person's plans.

There are two other matters I should emphasise. First, a person who has been away more than two years may still qualify as a returning resident under paragraph 59 of the rules, if, for example, he has lived here most of his life; secondly, if in any case there were difficulties in reaching a decision at the port about whether the person met the returning resident's requirements, he would normally be admitted for a limited period. This would give him the opportunity to produce the necessary evidence and apply for his settled status to be restored. If we concluded——

Skill Centres (Sale)

Motion made and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

11.55 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I raise the Adjournment debate in anger and outrage at the attack on skill centres by the Government and by this Minister, who has been in charge of it. The move to sell off the skill centres has created uncertainty. It has pushed carefully prepared budgets to one side and has created a shortage of money for the maintenance and replacement of machinery that is vital for training processes and for helping people adequately to undertake courses at skill centres.

In the words of Geoffrey Holland, accounting officer for the Training Agency:

"During the period of uncertainty pending the privatisation decision, capital spending was restricted to essentials".

What does that really mean on the ground where people receive their training, a ground that is unfamiliar to the Minister? It means that in a skill centre with which I am familiar, the manager did not know whether to spend £400, which he could ill afford, on a milling machine—for the Minister's information, that is an important piece of machine tool equipment—or to scrap it because it was too much for the budget. That is the effect of the decision that Ministers have taken to privatise the skill centres. Indeed, that was the first aim that the Secretary of State for Employment set out when he made that announcement. However, there is more to come.

The sale of the centres, often located on valuable land, has been carried out in a deceitful and underhand way, which calls into question sections of the civil service and their integrity, and the Government's adopted procedures, which have denied a fair bidding process. I am fundamentally opposed to the privatisation of the skill centres—they could and have worked perfectly well in the public domain and under public ownership. But if they are to be sold off, surely it is reasonable to ask that the procedure undertaken is fair and open, which is patently not the case in this process. The Government always claim that they are interested in

"turning around a business which is currently unprofitable and creating training businesses with good prospects of viability."—[Official Report, 1 May 1990, Vol. 171, c. 472.]

That is the sort of answer that the Minister has used in parliamentary answers and on other occasions.

The sale announcement was made in March 1989. The document was prepared by Deloitte Corporate Finance and was issued on behalf of the Secretary of State for Employment. Incidentally, Deloitte has done quite well out of this because its fees are already more than £350,000, including VAT, and all the advisers involved can confidently expect that when the Government get round to revealing the figures in the summer, those fees will be in excess of £0·5 million of taxpayers' money.

Copies of Deloitte's document were issued under a promise of secrecy and had to be returned—as though Deloitte was unaware that photocopying had been invented. The Minister has not yet revealed the number of documents involved, but I am sure that with the number of civil servants at his command, he will manage tomorrow to answer the questions that I have tabled for answer today.

At least 40 groups were, to my certain knowledge, interested. Several of them made tender offers. Bidders were invited to submit offers. What bidders did not know was that three senior civil servants, ludicrously termed a management buy-out team, were preparing a plan to buy. They were financed by the Government in that they did this in ordinary working hours and were "in contact with professional advisors as from the autumn of 1988."

The advisors were paid for from taxpayers' funds.

The only safeguard for those insider dealers, according to an answer of 27 March, was this:

"Given their special position as a management buy-out team, in early April 1989, my Department removed the three officers concerned from direct responsibility for decisions affecting both personnel matters and the expenditure of public money. This was done to ensure that bias could not enter into decisions"—[Official Report, 27 March 1990; Vol. 170, c. 157-58.]

The three officers were responsible for the national operation of the skill centres.

No use was made of the rules governing acceptance of outside appointments by Crown servants. Those rules were published in 1988, and appendix B states:

"It is in the public interest that people with experience of public administration should be able to move into business or other bodies and that the possibility of such movement should not be frustrated by unjustified public concern over a particular appointment. It is also no less important whenever a Crown servant accepts a particular outside appointment that there should be no cause for any suspicion of impropriety. The rules set out below have been designed to safeguard against such criticism both the public service and individual officers who wish to leave to take up these appointments. The aim of the rules is: (a) to counter suspicion, however unjustified, that the advice and decisions of a serving officer might be influenced by the hope or expectation of future employment with a particular firm or organisation; and (b) to avoid the risk that a particular firm or organisation might be gaining an unfair advantage over competitors by employing an officer who has had in his official career access to information which those competitors could legitimately regard as their own trade secrets."

Appendix B also states that the rules apply to Crown servants of grade 3 level, or equivalent and above; and

"below Grade 3 to whom an offer of appointment or employment of the kind to which the rules apply is made and who has at any time during the course of his or her official duties in the two years before leaving Crown service (or earlier if the association has been of a continued or repeated nature) had with the company or other organisation making the offer the kind of personal involvement described in paragraph 9 below."

I mention these extracts from the document because the Minister seems somewhat unfamiliar with it. It goes on to say that the criteria for dealing with applications include the following:

"Particular attention should be paid to appointments where the prospective employer

(a) has a contractual relationship with the Government;
(b) is in receipt of subsidies or their equivalent from the Government;
(c) is one in which the Government is a shareholder;
(d) is in receipt of loans, guarantees or other forms of financial assistance from the Government; or
(e) is one with which Services, or Departments or branches of Government, are as a matter of course in a special relationship."

All those criteria are met in full by the position of the three civil servants dealing with the skill centres. The rules are perfectly proper and sensible, designed to give the public confidence in the operation of civil servants, keeping companies with which they are in contact at arm's length so there can be no question or suspicion of any impropriety or favouring or that civil servants are manoeuvring themselves into an advantageous position. They are designed to stop insider dealing in the civil service —the sort of thing that the Government have frowned on in the stock exchange. Corruption springs from insider dealing. Yet those very rules were set aside by the Minister.

It is interesting to note how the Government apply rules to councillors. The rules that they formulate for other people are not set aside. The national code of local government conduct must now be signed by councillors and orders tabled by three Departments must be considered and approved by the House. The code of conduct says, in paragraph 6:

"You should never do anything as a councillor which you could not justify to the public. Your conduct, and what the public believes about your conduct, will affect the reputation of your council, and of your party if you belong to one. It is not enough to avoid actual impropriety. You should at all times avoid any occasion for suspicion and any appearance of improper conduct."

Paragraph 9 continues:

"Interests which are not pecuniary can be just as important. You should not allow the impression to be created that you are, or may be, using your position to promote a private or personal interest, rather than forwarding the general public interest."

Such words denote a curious sort of attitude on the part of a Government who have paid for three civil servants to have advisers to work full time on a plan to take over a publicly owned body, given that those civil servants were part of a tendering process.

The other bidders were not just a group of cowboys, as the Minister knows. One of the consortia that bid was headed by Sir Richard O'Brien, the former chairman of the Manpower Services Commission. Not even the Minister could dismiss such a bid as irrelevant. Bidders were not informed that the Government were to provide £11 million to the successful bidder. Only Astra was told that.

There is a stock reply. On Tuesday 1 May I asked the Secretary of State for Employment,

"pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Bradford, South of 23 April, Official Report, column 99, at what stage of negotiations following the receipt of bids for skill centres it was decided that £11 million should be given to Astra Training Services; and what steps were taken to ascertain whether other bidders would revise their positions in the light of the sum being offered."

The response from the Minister lounging on the Bench was:

"The payment of £11 million from the Government to Astra Training Services Ltd. represented Astra's assessment of the costs of turning around a business which is currently unprofitable and creating training businesses with good prospects of viability. Deloittes, in conjunction with my Department's other advisers, evaluated all the offers and made recommendations to my Department. The Government decided that the Astra offer, including the £11 million payment, met the Government's six objectives for the sale (a copy of which was placed in the Vote Office on 13 February 1990) more fully than competing offers."—[Official Report, 1 May 1990; Vol. 171, c. 472.]

But the competing offers were not really competing offers because they did not have the information that £11 million was available. The Minister shakes his head, but my information is that that was not made clear. If it was, why did not the Minister say so in answer to the question that I have just read out?

In any case, the Minister has decided that the tender should be given to the very three people heading the organisation that produced a loss of £27 million, which is why the Government decided to privatise the concern—claiming that it would be better in the marketplace. That seems a curious choice to say the least.

The document that Deloitte put out contained some interesting information. On page 27, appendix 4, which is headed "Principal lease terms", says:

"Many Skillcentres occupy valuable sites, several with considerable development potential. The Department considers that these properties might be too expensive for many business purchasers. Therefore, purchasers will be offered the option of: (a) acquiring the Department's freehold or long leasehold interest; or (b) taking a lease of the properties. Where a purchaser wishes to acquire the Department's interest, it will be available on terms which reflect its full value."

That document contains a clear implication—indeed, an expression—that some of the sites will be so expensive that lease terms will be made available in order to maintain, one supposes, the skill centres. Therefore, it is rather surprising to find that 27 freehold sites have been acquired by Astra Training Services and that two of those sites are in the most valuable sector. They are grade A sites rather than grade B or C which would decrease in value. They are sites "with considerable development potential."

What conditions are being imposed to prevent taxpayers from being ripped off? Is the £11 million being used to buy sites that will later be sold for development by Astra at a considerable profit, only a proportion of the added value being required by the Government? Will the Minister confirm that METEL, which bought the Liverpool site freehold, has just made 25 people redundant? That hardly augurs well for extending the skill centre facilities.

The net replacement costs for all 60 sites, according to the annual report published in document No. 337, "Training Commission Accounts 1988-89", was £86,749,000. Are the sites that have been sold to Astra Training Services Ltd. worth about £40 million? Perhaps the Minister will tell us about that. What price has been received? It is not a question of commercial incompetence. These affairs involve public sites and a grant of £11 million to an inside tenderer. The public should know whether one of the criteria that the Secretary of State announced, that value should be obtained for any site disposed of, has been fully met. We will not be able to know that unless the Minister provides the information.

It would be a cruel irony of the marketplace, would it not, if, after four years when the conditions no longer apply, Astra is wound up after selling off the site, the company pockets the £40 million, and the directors retire? No doubt the Minister will be keen to know that, according to information provided to me by the Library, on 8 May the three directors, diligent as no doubt they are, had failed to lodge the articles or memorandum of association or any other information with Companies house.

The debate gives the Minister an opportunity to provide information. On the face of it, this is a sleazy conspiracy to rip off the taxpayer. Dedicated civil servants have worked for low salaries for many years to make the skill centres a success, only to find that the Government's decision has placed their future in jeopardy. Already, more than 50 have sought transfers away from the skill centres because of the lack of certainty and confidence in their future. When the Secretary of State made the statement he made it clear that he thought highly of the people who worked in the skill centres. However, the leadership, the three civil servants concerned, were wrong to become involved. There may have been a temptation, but they were wrong. Ministers were wrong to involve them. When the Minister and the Secretary of State took up office they signed a Cabinet document placing upon them obligation not to involve civil servants in political activities.

The sale of the skill centres, the rush to privatisation, is a political activity brought about by the ideology of the ruling party. Ministers should not have placed civil servants in that position. They should have ensured that the tendering process was open and seen to be open, provided all the information that was available to all the bidders so that the process was seen to be fair, and the insider dealing should have been stopped.

At the very least, Ministers should have applied the ground rules governing the relationship between civil servants and the private sector. To set those rules to one side inevitably evokes criticism and suspicion and that will continue until the matter is fully investigated by the Comptroller and Auditor General or the National Audit Office. But that will take more than a year and we need the answers now.

12.15 am

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Tim Eggar): As usual, the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) fully lived up to his reputation——

Mr. Cryer: Just give me the answers.

Mr. Eggar: I take the strongest exception to the hon. Gentleman's suggestion that there was something improper in the decision to sell the bulk of the Skills Training Agency to the management buy-out team. There is not one shred of evidence to justify his assertion and he knows that perfectly well.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that the position of the management buy-out team was described clearly and openly to the House when the sale of the STA was announced by the then Secretary of State for Employment on 13 March 1989. The management buy-out team was removed from any direct responsibility for decisions affecting both the expenditure of public money and personnel matters. The hon. Gentleman knows that perfectly well, because it has been spelt out to him in written answers.

Mr. Cryer: I said that in my speech. Why repeat it?

Mr. Eggar: It is typical of the hon. Gentleman that he sits there muttering. He must exercise his responsibility——

Mr. Cryer: Answer the questions.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The Minister is attempting to answer the debate.

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman must exercise his responsibility as a Member of the House. He should not use the opportunity that his privileged position gives him to cast slurs on people in the way that he has done tonight.

The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the civil servants were supported in their sale negotiations by professional advisers of experience and integrity. I am satisfied that the team acted throughout with the utmost probity, and that its success resulted from the merits of its bid, not from any other cause.

[Mr. Eggar]

I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should, on reflection, make it clear to the House that he has no grounds for the assertions that he has made this evening. He should not use his privileged position to cast slurs on people who he knows perfectly well cannot reply.

I take this matter extremely seriously. The purchasers of skill centres accept that the transfers are governed by the regulations and on the basis of the discussions between my Department's advisers and the purchasers. There is no reason to suppose that any breach is intended.

The Government have virtually completed the move of the STA into the private sector. We announced our intention to do so in our White Paper in December 1988 and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State told the House in February this year that we had agreed terms of sale for more than three quarters of the business.

That is a considerable achievement for a business which has had a long history of financial problems. In the past six years the STA has broken even financially only once. Those losses arose despite an arrangement under which the public sector purchased a fixed amount of training from the STA. That arrangement rightly ended in 1987 following criticism of it by the Public Accounts Committee.

At that time, we took advice on the scope for turning the STA into a more competitive and viable training business, able to compete on level terms with other providers of training, without subsidies and artificial prices —which had been such a feature of its time in the public sector.

Given the STA's massive losses—up to £30 million in the last financial year—there was no prospect of maintaining its network of training centres within my Department. To keep a network of any kind, it was necessary to sell. Therefore, the Skills Training Agency was put up for sale by public tender. It may help the hon. Gentleman—if anything ever helps the hon. Gentleman —if I describe how that sale was conducted. It had to meet the objectives that the Government set themselves at an early stage. They were as the hon. Gentleman briefly described them in his speech. It is important to recognise that those six objectives had a significant bearing on the outcome of the sale.

It was not a privatisation, where the first objective is to ensure the maximum financial return. If we had wanted that, we would simply have shut down the STA and sold off its very considerable property assets. But we did not want to lose training capacity which we felt had the potential to become viable. Our first objective was to transfer into the private sector as much of the training business as we could.

Our having decided on that objective, the sale process became a fairly complex one in which we had to balance the preservation of training, proper treatment of the property assets, and the taxpayers' interests in those assets —as well as the overall financial returns. Throughout the sale process, Ministers were advised by Deloitte Corporate Finance. It prepared an information memorandum that fully described the STA, the scale of its operation, the nature of its business, and the property that it occupied. That memorandum was sent to a number of organisations that had expressed serious interest in the sale.

On the basis of that memorandum and of discussions between potential purchasers and our advisers, indicative bids were received and evaluated. Some bids were rejected as inadequate, and the remainder were subjected to more detailed negotiation, which covered all aspects of the bids, ranging from the price proposed for the business and the treatment of the property, through to bidders' proposals for safeguarding the terms and conditions of staff employment and offering suitable pension agreements.

All potential bidders were treated on the same footing, and all bids ultimately received were evaluated against the same criteria—taking full account of our six objectives.

On the basis of that very full evaluation, we announced on 13 February that the majority of businesses would be taken over by Astra Training Services Ltd. Its offer covered 46 skill centres, plus the STA's head office and various other assets. Astra, the main successful bidder, is —as the hon. Gentleman stated—a company formed by a management buy-out team at the STA's head office. That successful management buy-out represents the first of its kind in the civil service. The Astra bid, together with the others that were successful, means that 51 of the 60 skill centres will be sold as training businesses.

Those STA property interests not included in the sale package that was announced will be offered for sale on the open market, bringing in substantial sums to the Exchequer.

I would have been pleased to secure Astra's bid for 46 of the skill centres. In the event, it can take only 45. It cannot take the Chesterfield centre because it was one of a number of sites where the sale of the business depended on the agreement of the landlord to transfer the centre's lease from my Department to Astra. I am sorry to tell the House that the landlord in that instance, Chesterfield borough council, which is Labour-controlled, refused to transfer the lease, thus forcing the skill centre to close and depriving Chesterfield of training services.

I must add that news emerged today about the sale of the Liverpool skill centre to Merseyside Education Training Enterprise Ltd. I understand that, as the hon. Gentleman said, METEL has made all the staff transferred to it from the Skills Training Agency redundant, less than 24 hours after completion of the sale. The Department negotiated the sale of an established business in good faith, and had taken some comfort from the fact that METEL is a charity and from the membership of METEL's board.

We are determined to support our former employees in enforcing their legal rights, and to ensure continuity of training for the trainees from the centre. We are currently examining the contractual position, and are offering our former employees access to legal advice.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South referred to the clawback terms on property asset disposals. If he had done his research, he would know perfectly well that the clawback terms are a matter of public record. Development gains will be repaid to the extent of 100 per cent. on gains realised in the first three years after privatisation, 75 per cent. in the following year, 50 per cent. the year after, and 25 per cent. in the remaining five years. That meets the requirements that my right hon. Friend the Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) set out in March——

The motion having been made after Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MADAM DEPUTY SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Oral Answers to Questions

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Dangerous Goods

1. Mr. Jack Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further steps he is taking to strengthen legislation against sellers of dangerous goods.

2. Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what further steps he is taking to strengthen legislation against sellers of dangerous goods.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr. Eric Forth): The introduction of the general safety requirement in part II of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 means that it is now a criminal offence to sell any consumer product that is not reasonably safe. That is supported by specific regulations and by a range of enforcement powers that enable action to be taken effectively and swiftly against unsafe consumer goods. I see no justification for further legislation in this area.

Mr. Thompson: Will the Minister take into account the fact that local authorities have had carefully to examine staffing levels in their trading standards departments simply as a result of the introduction of the poll tax? Will he consider at least changing part II of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 to extend the period of time for prosecutions from six months to about three years? There is great demand among local authorities for that change and it is important that it is considered. Will the Minister also consider legislation on the importation of radioactive goods such as smoke detectors, certain types of switchgear and watches?

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman gives me an opportunity to pay tribute to the work done by trading standards departments up and down the land, which do excellent work on behalf of the consumer. Of course, it is for local authorities to decide their priorities. I hope that all local authorities will always give the highest priority to their duties under the Consumer Protection Act 1987 to give resources to the trading standards departments. I am confident that they will do so. As for radioactive material, if the hon. Gentleman will write to me, I shall consider the matter carefully in order to assess, apart from anything else, whether it is my responsibility. I should like to consider the matter in more detail.

Mr. Wardell: Will the Minister give three good reasons why he is not prepared to amend part II of the Consumer Protection Act 1987 in order to allow trading standards officers more time to prosecute sellers of goods that result in injury or put people's lives at risk?

Mr. Forth: I shall give the hon. Gentleman one reason. Although my Department has asked for them, I have not yet received positive and substantial reasons why we need such an extension of the time limit. I give the hon. Gentleman this undertaking. As and when anyone gives me real evidence that the six-months time limit is a real obstacle to the effective pursuit of prosecutions, I shall look at it positively. We have asked for such evidence and we are still waiting.

Mr Nicholas Bennett: Will my hon. Friend consider referring to the Office of Fair Trading a range of goods that have come on to the market in the past couple of years, which claim to be innocuous, are prettily packaged and have no price on them? The appear to be coming from an address in Walworth road.

Mr. Forth: If I can pick up the drift of what my hon. Friend is saying, I suspect that one of the problems with the products emerging from Walworth road is that we are still waiting for full disclosure of all the details, to say nothing of the fine print. When we see some of that, the goods may well be categorised as grotesquely unsafe to the public.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths: Does not the Minister realise that not only trading standards officers of local authorities but the prosecution service and the testing stations of his Department determine delays in bringing prosecutions against the sellers of dangerous goods? When trading standards officers throughout the country are telling the Minister that sellers of dangerous goods get away scot-free because of the six-month time limit on prosecutions, why has the Minister failed to review that serious loophole in our consumer protection law?

Mr. Forth: In his relatively brief tenure in office, the hon. Gentleman has made a speciality of making unsubstantiated statements from the Dispatch Box. I tell him in all generosity that I have had no such information or approaches from trading standards departments. When I receive detailed and substantial evidence that the time limit is causing the problem that he suggests, and as I have undertaken to his hon. Friend the Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell), I shall consider it positively, but I am awaiting that evidence. The hon. Gentleman might well prod trading standards departments to come forward more quickly.

Teesside Development Corporation

3. Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he last met the chairman of Teesside development corporation to discuss development in Teesside.

The Minister for Industry (Mr. Douglas Hogg): I have not met Mr. Norman in his capacity as chairman of the Teesside development corporation, but I am well aware of TDC's achievements. I was pleased to see that unemployment in my hon. Friend's constituency has fallen by 22·4 per cent. over the past 12 months. I am advised that the TDC has £1 million worth of factory space under construction.

Mr. Holt: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that reply and I hope that it will not be too long before he meets Mr. Norman. When he does, will he please convey to him the thanks of the people of Teesside for the work done by the TDC in regenerating and revitalising our area? If there is any drawback at all, it is that we still have to contend with Cleveland county council. Perhaps we can abolish that and extend the TDC to the whole area.

Mr. Hogg: I shall indeed bear in mind what my hon. Friend has said, and discuss with Mr. Norman the important fact that during the past two years, by the selective use of regional assistance, about 2,500 new jobs have been attracted into the Cleveland area. That is an important development for the whole region.

Space Research

4. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on United Kingdom participation in space research for peaceful purposes.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom is successfully carrying out a range of civil space activities, principally through the programmes of the European Space Agency. The main emphasis of our programme is on space science and on Earth observation. Development of Earth observation services will open up new commercial opportunities and play a significant role in monitoring the global environment and climate.

Mr. Atkinson: In view of the negative vibes that we were giving out to the European Space Agency two years ago, may I thank my hon. and learned Friend for that encouraging reply? Is he aware of the various plans to develop a space plane—Hermes in France, Saenger in West Germany, the Orient Express in the United States and our own HOTOL project? Does he agree that it would be sensible to collaborate internationally on such an expensive project, and to include Japan and the Soviet Union if possible? Will he initiate international discussions along those lines?

Mr. Hogg: We do not have any intention of putting Government money into HOTOL. If it ever takes place, it is likely to be an enormously expensive project, and very few vehicles would be required. If there are industrial participants who are thinking in terms of it, I should certainly commend to those involved international co-operation of the sort suggested by my hon. Friend. I take this opportunity to emphasise the Government's commitment to the programmes sponsored by the European Space Agency.

Mr. Page: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the most profitable aspect of space science has been telecommunications, in which we have been enormously successful in the past? Is he concerned that we might be losing that lead? Is he fully convinced that we are giving all the support necessary to the new projects coming forward?

Mr. Hogg: That is an important question. The Government are trying to take on projects in space that are likely to give rise to the most useful programmes in the foreseeable future. We have done well in telecommunications in space, and British industry leads the field in that. As a specific reply to my hon. Friend, he may know that we have just announced a commitment of another £32 million towards what is known as DRTM—the data relay technology mission. We shall be researching inter-communications between satellites and between mobile land satellites.

Steel Industry

5. Mr. John Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the future of the steel industry in the United Kingdom.

9. Mrs. Margaret Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the principal regular subjects of discussion at meetings between himself and the chairperson and board of British Steel plc on which he answers to Parliament.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: British Steel is now a private sector company free from Government control. Over the last 10 years there has been a transformation in the fortunes of British Steel, which is now one of the most successful and productive steel companies in the world. I am confident that that success will continue in the future.

Mr. Hughes: Does the Minister acknowledge that the product of the Government's suicidal economic policies, which have resulted in catastrophically high interest rates, is the loss of the jobs of thousands of workers in the steel industry in Scotland and Wales? Will he explain what steps he has taken to counteract that effect? Is he aware that British Steel has only 2 per cent. of the market share in the Common Market, in which demand is increasing at 3 per cent? What steps will he take to ensure that the British steel industry will meet that demand?

Mr. Hogg: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has not done credit to what is an important issue. The plain truth is that the fortunes of British Steel have been dramatically transformed in the past 10 years and it is now one of the most successful steel-making concerns in the whole of Europe. We should not forget that between 1975 and 1985 the subsidies to the steel industry, expressed in today's money, were £14,430 million. I should have thought that the House would be pleased to note that British Steel is now in profit.

Mrs. Ewing: This is an extremely important issue and it is clear that the Minister is not responding to the extreme anger that we feel in Scotland today about the despicable and disgraceful announcement by British Steel of the proposed closure of the hot strip mill at Ravenscraig next year. Why is not the Secretary of State for Scotland prepared to come along and sit on the Front Bench to hear the points that hon. Members are raising today? We are talking not just about the loss of 770 jobs directly but about the heart being torn out of the communities of central Scotland and about the core being removed from the Scottish economy.

When was this decision reached? Is it true that it was reached by the board in March of this year? When did the Department know about it? When did it discuss it with the Scottish Office? When will we have an opportunity to look at this in more detail?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Lady is being less than candid with the House. She has complained about the absence of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland; she knows perfectly well that my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office is on the Front Bench, and that there is a private notice question down for answer at 3.30 pm, to which my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State will be responding. So it was less than honest of the hon. Lady to pose her question in the way that she did.

Sir William Clark: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the success of the steel industry is proof positive that privatisation is much better than Government control?

Mr. Hogg: Absolutely; my hon. Friend is entirely right. During the 1970s the British steel industry was virtually destroyed by the Labour party policies that were then in place. Since then, there has been a dramatic upturn in the fortunes of British Steel, which came from a considered decision to let its managers manage their business in accordance with commercial criteria.

Mr. Oppenheim: Can there be any better example of socialist economic mismanagement than the performance of British Steel in the 1970s? Is not it true that in the 1970s the Labour Government pumped huge amounts of state subsidies into British Steel, which merely encouraged it to build up huge and unnecessary surplus capacity? It was strike-bound most of the time; it was unproductive; and at one point it was losing £1 million a day. Contrast that with today, when British Steel is one of the most profitable and productive steel companies in the world, with one of the best-paid work forces in Britain.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is entirely right. He referred to losses, and the House will wish to know that in the period 1979-80 British Steel lost—in today's money—£3,359 million. In the same period the United Kingdom steel industry was, I regret to say, at the bottom of the output league: output per man was about 160 tonnes, whereas we are now third in the ranking with output per man at about 347 tonnes.

Dr. Reid: On this of all days, the fact that the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry is not at the Dispatch Box now is a shameful disgrace. He cuts an ever more irrelevant and pathetic figure. Does not the Minister begin to understand the feelings of bitterness and betrayal in the Motherwell area? He will be the target of those feelings, and deservedly so. Why did not he heed our warnings about privatisation? Why did he go ahead despite those warnings and why has not he lifted as much as a little finger to argue for investment at Ravenscraig? Will he have the guts to admit that his complacency was wrong and give a guarantee that he will stand alongside Opposition Members who will fight to the end to reverse the decision taken this morning by British Steel?

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Gentleman's observations simply prove that the Labour party has learned nothing at all about the proper approach to industrial policy. I repeat to the House that between 1975 and 1985 subsidies to the British steel industry, in today's money, amounted to £14,430 million. That is a disgrace. The industry is now profitable and its output is among the most remarkable in Europe. That is a tribute to the process of privatisation.

Mr. Dickens: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that there are as many people working for British Steel today as there were 10 years ago? The British taxpayer was putting £600 million a year into British Steel. Today it is making £800 million profit.

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is entirely right to draw attention to the radically changed productivity record of British Steel. He is also entirely right when he says that what was a catastrophically loss-making industry is now profitable. We should be proud of that and not try to put back in place policies pursued by the Labour party that led to disaster.

Mr. Gordon Brown: Will the Minister explain how privatisation has ensured the future of Ravenscraig and the strip plant? Is not he ashamed to come before the House as the "do nothing" Minister who has simply walked away from his responsibilities to the steel industry? Will he confirm that the Secretary of State has not only refused to answer questions today but has failed to meet British Steel? When the chief executive of British Steel came to the Department of Trade and Industry yesterday no Minister bothered to meet him and he was met by only a few officials. Will the Minister now meet British Steel and demand that it explains itself? Will he call for the additional long-term investment that is now needed for a long-term and viable future for the steel industry in Scotland, England and Wales? How much more of Britain's manufacturing industry will he betray before he ends this dereliction of duty?

Mr. Hogg: I must say to the hon. Gentleman that I find his ranting profoundly depressing. Clearly, he has not understood or has not listened to any of the facts that I have given to the House. When the Labour Government were last in power the steel industry made a loss, in today's money of £3,359 million. That was a result of the type of policy—if the hon. Gentleman has one—that he is now calling for—that is, massive intervention. As the hon. Gentleman well knows, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has been in the far east selling Britain most effectively as a manufacturing country for inward investment. He also knows that my right hon. and learned Friend is coming to respond to a private notice question. The hon. Gentleman is a Scottish Member, so he would be the first to complain if some other Minister were first to make such a response.

Consumer Capital Goods

6. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what proposals he intends to bring forward to amend the law relating to the protection of purchasers of consumer capital goods.

Mr. Forth: The Government have announced their support for the Law Commission's recommendations to amend legislation on the sale and supply of goods and services. Those recommendations cover other transactions within the ambit of that legislation and not only those for "consumer capital goods". The private Member's Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones) would give legislative effect to those proposals.

Mr. Stern: Will not that private Member's Bill, which is at the moment in the other place, be a useful addition to the body of law if it is passed in its present form? However, once that Bill is passed, is not there still scope for a fresh look at protection of the purchasers of consumer capital goods?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is correct. In the shape in which it left the House and went to the other place, the private Member's Bill has the Government's full support, and I hope that it ends up on the statute book, because it would add considerably and significantly to consumer protection. My hon. Friend is also correct to say that I undertook that when the Bill is resolved one way or another by both Houses of Parliament, it will be appropriate for me and the Department to look at consumer guarantees—something on which my hon. Friend has pressed me on a number of occasions—to see whether it is appropriate to consider further legislation in that sector. I have undertaken to do that in the past and I gladly do so again.

Mr. Ashdown: While we are on the subject of consumer protection, is the Minister aware of the disgraceful failure of the Insurance Brokers Registration Council to protect the interests of consumers in the Wessex Trust affair, in which so many have lost, often their life savings? Is he further aware that the IBRC has lost applications for grants and sought to discourage eligible applications? If he says that he cannot and will not intervene to ensure that the IBRC fulfils its obligations, will he at least express his disapproval of its actions?

Mr. Forth: Far be it from me to invade your territory, Mr. Speaker, but if the right hon. Gentleman spent more time in the House, he would realise that he was asking supplementary questions not only on a subject which has nothing to do with the main question, but on something which has nothing to do with my responsibilities. It is entirely a matter for my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs. However, if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to write to the correct Minister in my Department, he will get an answer from my hon. Friend.

EC Trade

7. Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he will next meet his counterparts in the European Commission to discuss United Kingdom trade with the European Community.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Corporate Affairs (Mr. John Redwood): My right hon. Friend and I regularly meet European Commissioners and discuss with them a wide range of subjects.

Mr. Dunnachie: Is the Minister aware that imports to the United Kingdom from the EEC totalled some £2·7 billion in the 1970s and that in 1989, the figure had risen to £63·5 billion? In the light of that, will he outline his plans to improve the figure?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman should also note that there has been a big increase in our exports to the European Community because we are trading much more widely with our European partners than we were in 1970. The House should recognise that, since 1983, the ratio between our exports and imports in manufactured goods to the European Community has been improving. That is a direct result of the economic policies pursued by the Government, which have led to a massive increase in investment and productivity and an improvement in our manufacturing performance. I dread to think what would happen if we took the advice of Labour Members and adopted some of the policies emerging from the Labour party's latest policy review. On page 131 of his book, the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) recommends a major increase in corporate and investment taxation. That would be a good way to reverse the encouraging trend in the ratio between exports and imports in manufatured goods to Europe, which has been taking place since 1983.

Sir Hal Miller: When the Minister meets his counterparts, will he tell them that the motor trade has shown a positive improvement, and raise with them the question of the barriers being erected against cars made by British workers in British plants, using money supplied by British banks, albeit for a Japanese company? Will he do his best to ensure that those artificial barriers to trade are removed, so that we can complete the single market, and compete fairly, and that that takes place long before we move on to further measures of European unity?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend has done a great deal for the British motor industry and I am sure that he will be pleased to know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has carried the argument strongly into the counsels of our European partners. He has made it clear that cars produced in Britain, by whatever company under whatever ownership pattern, are British cars and therefore European cars and should circulate freely within the Common Market. That remains our position, and we have every confidence that our partners will accept it. My hon. Friend can rest assured that the Government will fight strongly for that right. We are proud of the revival in the British motor car manufacturing industry by new investors and existing investors who are already in this country. The cars are British. Opposition Members love to knock these investments, but they should welcome them and recognise the great contribution that British skills and money are making to the investments.

Mr. Skinner: What about the Italian fireplaces?

Ms. Quin rose——

Mr. Cryer: What about a few more Back Benchers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We cannot have this background noise. It is extremely disruptive and it does not help our debates.

Ms. Quin: From the Minister's earlier reply it would be difficult for many people to realise that we have a huge trade deficit with the EEC. As we do have such a deficit, why are the Government cutting export promotion research?

Mr. Redwood: The Government offer a range of assistance to stimulate exports in the best way that is suitable for exporters. The DTI is happy to offer that advice and assistance through its successful export promotion.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating. Our exports are improving relative to our imports, and the Government's macro-economic policies are an important part of the policy to bring together the two lines between imports and exports. There is nothing on offer from the Opposition. Their latest policy review is a sham and a pipe dream of the worst sort. There are no policies within it for controlling inflation or excess demand. The Government have put forward the necessary policies, and they will work.

Regional Assistance, Shropshire

8. Mr. Gill: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will consider extending regional selective assistance to south Shropshire.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Regional selective assistance is available to those parts of south Shropshire that have been designated as intermediate areas under the Industrial Development Act 1982. I have no plans to extend assisted area status to other parts of south Shropshire.

Mr. Gill: My hon. and learned Friend will be aware of the £14 million of taxpayers' money which is being made available to the Unitgate company for a poultry processing plant at Scunthorpe. He will further be aware of that company's declared intention to make 500 employees redundant at its plant at Craven Arms in my constituency. In refusing to make grants universally available or to scrap the system altogether, is my hon. and learned Friend aware of the serious competitive distortions that are caused within industries, leading inevitably to the transfer of jobs from one area to another? In the light of the example that I have given, will the Government review their policy?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend referred to jobs in his constituency. I am sure that he is as pleased as I am to note that during the past 12 months unemployment in his constituency has fallen by 23·7 per cent. I am aware of my hon. Friend's concern about the particular application to which he has drawn attention. Indeed, he has seen my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to discuss it. There is, however, a misunderstanding. The scheme to which my hon. Friend referred at Scunthorpe involves a chicken plant, for which RSA was provided. The facility in his constituency is a turkey concern. They have feathers in common, but nothing else. I am satisfied that RSA is being applied sensibly and usefully.

Car Production

10. Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the numbers of cars produced in the United Kingdom over the last five years.

14. Mr. Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the numbers of cars produced in the United Kingdom over the last five years.

The Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and President of the Board of Trade (Mr. Nicholas Ridley): To the nearest thousand, 1,048,000 cars were produced in 1985; 1,019,000 in 1986; 1,143,000 in 1987; 1,227,000 in 1988 and 1,299,000 in 1989.

Mr. Boswell: I thank my right hon. Friend for that answer and recognise the improving trend that it shows. However, does he agree that the figures still show an overlarge deficit in that sector? With the new investment from both Japanese and home-grown companies, does he think that the figures will improve still further in the next five years, with consequential benefits both for the balance of trade and for British steel production?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is right. We have reversed the disastrous effects of Labour's policies in the late 1970s, when the production of cars fell from 1·5 million to fewer than 1 million per year. With present investments in prospect, the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders estimates that 2 million units will be produced per annum by the mid-1990s. That will more than twice overtake the position that we inherited. It is a remarkable demonstration of the success of the Government's policies compared with those that the Opposition are still peddling.

Mr. Squire: Does my right hon. Friend agree that while those figures confirm that Opposition claims of a collapse of manufacturing industry are not borne out in the motor industry in any way, shape or form, it remains critical in such a multinational industry that wages and productivity remain competitive so that we can be attractive to investment, not just now but over the next decade?

Mr. Ridley: My hon. Friend is right—productivity is the key to competitive success and to improving wages. It may interest the House to know that Rover produced six cars per man-year in 1979, but in 1989 it produced 20 cars per man-year. That is the sort of level which, although still not adequate, shows the extreme necessity of higher productivity in British industry, and which has been achieved in that case. That is necessary if we are to regain market shares throughout the world.

Mr. Harry Ewing: Will the Secretary of State consider both aspects of the manufacture of new cars, the other aspect being the sale of new cars? Will he discuss with manufacturers the type of advertising material that places heavy emphasis on the very high top speeds that the cars can achieve in a short time? Is he aware of the number of recent tragic accidents in which youngsters have been killed trying to reach the high top speeds that manufacturers advertise for their vehicles?

Mr. Ridley: The hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that last year 991,000 cars built in British factories were sold to United Kingdom customers in the home market. That is the highest for any year since 1973. If customers want high acceleration, manufacturers must provide it. I remind the hon. Gentleman that the law of the land sets speed limits and they are enforced by the police. He is right to suggest that people should not break the law of the land and cause accidents. However, I am not responsible for the traffic laws, and it is necessary for manufacturers to produce what the customers want.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Does the Secretary of State intend to provide any evidence to the European Commission inquiry into why car prices in Britain are so much higher than in the European Community?

Mr. Ridley: As the hon. Gentleman knows, the matter has been referred to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission for an in-depth study. In view of my statutory position in relation to the MMC, it would be wrong of me to make any comment or to refer any evidence myself. The MMC's duty is to collect such evidence as it thinks necessary to pursue its inquiries.

Mr. Grylls: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the increase in the production of cars in Britain is very much attendant on their having free entry to the continental market? Although he has taken a robust line on the matter with his colleagues, can he tell us when the problem will be resolved and when cars from plants located in Britain will be allowed freely into countries such as France?

Mr. Ridley: I agree entirely with my hon. Friend's sentiments. At present, cars manufactured in Britain, by whatever company and whoever owns it, are allowed free circulation into the European Community. We intend to maintain that position and I believe that under the treaty of Rome it should be maintained. A new question has been raised by some member states in relation to the regime for the import of Japanese cars after 1992. I make it absolutely clear that the Government are adamant that there should be no change in the position of what are called transplants. They will continue to maintain free entry into the market, without there being any effects on any other matter.

Mr. Henderson: The Secretary of State will know that recent proposals from the Commission identify cars produced in Sunderland, potentially in Derby and also in Swindon, as cars which, during the transitional period, would be counted as part of the Japanese quota. I understand the strong words that the Secretary of State expressed this week to the Japanese Government. Can he tell the House how he intends to ensure that cars made in Sunderland, Derby and Swindon will be classified as British? Does he accept that if he is to get majority EC support for the proposal he will inevitably have to talk to the French, the Italians and the Spanish about extending the time limit on the transitional period?

Mr. Ridley: I did not use strong words on the issue to the Japanese, but I certainly did to the Commission, and to the Spaniards, the French and the Italians. They are the ones who received the strong words, to the effect that there will be no question but that these cars will have the free circulation to which they are entitled under the treaty of Rome. I believe that the matter will be resolved soon and entirely in our favour.

Balance of Trade (Japan)

11. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received regarding the United Kingdom's balance of trade with Japan.

Mr. Redwood: The Department of Trade and Industry receives a number of representations from time to time on the matter. My hon. Friend may like to know that in the most recent year our exports to Japan have risen by 30 per cent. and imports by only 9 per cent. We hope that that welcome improvement in trend will continue.

Mrs. Gorman: I thank my hon. Friend for his reply. I know that he understands the free market and how it works. Does he agree that our constant worry about the balance of trade deficit with countries such as Japan is about as important as worrying about the balance of trade between Birmingham and Edinburgh, or between Bradford and Bruges? When British people voluntarily buy goods that they want, what they part with is money —which the foreigners cannot eat or stuff into their futons, and which is subsequently reinvested in Britain. Does he agree that what we should worry about is abolishing obstacles to free trade both here and abroad?

Mr. Redwood: In her usual colourful way, my hon. Friend has made a good economic point. She is right that the party to which she and I belong does not wish to see obstacles placed in the way of people buying the things that they wish to buy. I wish that we could say the same of the Labour party, which wants credit controls to stop people buying Japanese videos, televisions and similar products. Where my hon. Friend and I believe that it is important to make strong representations to our trading partners is if they fall short of the high standards of free trade that we all wish to see worldwide. There are occasions when it is necessary to make strong representations. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has just returned from a strenuous trip to Japan, where he has been making some of the points that British business wanted us to make. I should add that Japanese trade is much smoother in that respect than trade with some other countries.

Dr. Kim Howells: Does the Minister consider, in the light of his previous answer, that an additional reason for our comparatively low sales of cars and other goods to Japan may be that the Government have done their best to gut innovative research and development in this country, and that we are simply not keeping up with trends and developments in many important areas?

Mr. Redwood: I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman is badly informed. The Japanese are having to set up car plants in this country because they also wish to set up design centres here, which will draw heavily upon the skills of British designers and engineers for the next generation of Japanese cars for the European market, with a strong skill input from people in this country. He also ignores the point of my reply to the previous question—that our export performance with Japan is improving because customers recognise that we offer goods of quality with substantial skill and design content and they are buying more of our goods day by day.

Mr. Dunn: Surely the truth of the matter is that we do not enjoy free and fair trade with the empire of Japan. Is not it a fact that Japanese goods find it easy to gain access to markets in this country whereas our exports find it immensely difficulty to gain access to Japanese markets? Should not we tell the Japanese Government that unless they mend their ways in terms of economic warfare we shall declare war?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend should note that the average tariff on industrial products imported into Japan is substantially lower than that on industrial products imported into the European Community. There have been some isolated sectoral problems with Japan. We are pleased with the progress made, for example, with whisky as exports are growing rapidly as a result of changes made by the Japanese Government. There are problems in the footwear and leather sector, which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has drawn to the attention of our Japanese opposite numbers. The House should recognise that Japan is not a bad trading partner, that we are pleased with the way trade is developing, we give a warm welcome to Japanese investors here, and it would be wrong to jeopardise that position with ill-chosen words.

Dr. Moonie: Will the Minister tell the House exactly what are the figures for the balance of our trade with Japan over the past year?

Mr. Redwood: The balance of trade with Japan in 1989 was minus £4·8 billion.

Car Exports (Japan)

12. Mr. Neil Hamilton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the levels of United Kingdom exports of cars to Japan in (a) 1988 and (b) 1989.

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend will be pleased to know that in 1988 we exported 8,099 cars to Japan, worth £65 million, and in 1989 we exported 15,500 cars worth £126 million, which makes the point that the Opposition do not want to understand—that the position is improving rapidly and the improvement is very welcome.

Mr. Hamilton: Does my hon. Friend agree that the growing strength of the British car industry is entirely due to the tremendous changes that have been brought about in industrial relations in that industry as a result of legislation introduced during the past 12 years, all of which was opposed by Labour Members, and that the jobs of British car workers are protected by the increasing export performance of British car companies to countries such as Japan? Will he confirm that Japan is our ninth best export market?

Mr. Redwood: My hon. Friend is right on both counts. Of course, the improved industrial relations record is a most important feature. It is a shame that even now the Labour party cannot agree on the importance of those reforms and totally opposes some of them in the political advice given to the Government in the Labour party's latest policy review—the fourth or fifth review, I have lost count of how many there have been.

The House may also like to know how well trade in motor cars with Japan went in the 1970s, when the Opposition had a chance to put into practice the policies that they are still preaching. In the worst year, we exported 891 cars compared with 15,500 last year. In the Labour Government's best year, to give them credit, the figure reached 3,393. Those were the years when the British motor industry was dogged by high taxation, high borrowing and bad labour relations—the same recipe as the Labour party's new policy review.

Mr. Roy Hughes: How do the puny levels of British car exports to Japan compare with the levels of British car exports to the Common Market, and how do our actual exports compare with the radiant forecasts made by Lord Stokes when he was chairman of British Leyland way back in 1972? Can the Minister also tell us something about the import of cars into Britain from the Common Market?

Mr. Redwood: The hon. Gentleman's question is outside the terms of the main question. We import more cars than we export to member states of the European Community, and the total trade in cars is much larger than that with Japan. The figures are in the Library if the hon. Gentleman cares to look them up, or he can table an appropriate question. The point that he is trying to make misses the dynamics of the British motor car industry. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the industry went through a bad time in the 1970s, improved in the 1980s and will have a splendid time in the 1990s—the decade of manufacturing revival under a Conservative Government with most welcome inward investment from several overseas countries.

Mr. Roger King: My hon. Friend will probably know that the mini-car produced by Rover Group has long been a good seller in Japan—it sells in ever greater quantities each and every year—but is he also aware that Nissan in Sunderland will be producing a unique five-door version to succeed the Bluebird which will be exported exclusively to Japan? Japanese transplant factories are thus producing goods for their own home market.

Mr. Redwood: Indeed. I am grateful to my hon. Friend for bringing his expertise to bear on the subject. He is an expert on the motor industry and his support and encouragement for it are most welcome. I am even more pleased to note that he does so much to promote exports to Japan without receiving any commission for it.

West Midlands

15. Mr. Bellingham: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what recent representations he has received from engineering firms in the west midlands.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State regularly receives representations on a range of issues from engineering firms operating in the west midlands.

Mr. Bellingham: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that many companies in King's Lynn and west Norfolk have done well as subcontractors for some of the great firms in the west midlands and, as a result, unemployment has come down sharply? What has happened to the employment picture in the west midlands over the past two years?

Mr. Hogg: Most people would say that that was a planted question, but it is not. However, the answer is extremely cheering. I chanced to have an analysis done of west midlands constituencies and I will share the results with the House. Between March 1989 and March 1990 a sample result showed unemployment in Sutton Coldfield down 29 per cent., in Solihull down 28 per cent., in Halesowen down 26 per cent., in Dudley, West down 21 per cent., in Dudley, East down 19 per cent., in Birmingham, Yardley down 19 per cent., in Birmingham, Hodge Hill down 21 per cent., in Birmingham, Hall Green down 18 per cent. and in Aldridge-Brownhills down 18 per cent.—dramatic falls in unemployment right across the west midlands.

Mr. Grocott: Can the Minister confirm that substantially fewer engineering firms in the west midlands are now in a position to make representations to him than when the Government came to power in 1979?

Mr. Hogg: That is the sort of dreary question that we have got used to hearing from Labour Members. Let us look at the facts. Productivity in the engineering industry in the west midlands has gone up hugely in the past two years, profitability in the west midlands has gone up hugely, exports have gone up very much and inward investment has been extraordinarily successful. The opportunities for the west midlands are huge, and if the hon. Gentleman asks for figures, I will give him them.

Mr. Conway: Is my hon. and learned Friend aware that the engineering companies in Shropshire, which is part of the west midlands, are doing well under revitalised mangement? How would they progress if we had an inflation rate of 27 per cent. and the highest corporation tax in the industrialised world—both were legacies of the last Labour Government—if we were ever stupid enough to have another Labour Government?

Mr. Hogg: The plain truth is that the Labour party's policies would be a disaster for the west midlands. Let us examine just two of them. First, by their very nature, Labour's economic policies would cause inflation to escalate fast. Then there is the party's taxation policy. We have not heard much from the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott) about a payroll tax, but it unquestionably features in Labour party policy. A payroll tax which would cost industry about £3 billion would be disastrous.

Mr. Speaker indicated dissent.

Mr. Hogg: You shake your head, Mr. Speaker, as perhaps you should. [Interruption.] I can take a hint as well as the next man.

Trade Statistics

16. Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he has received any correspondence from the Statistics Users Council on the availability of indicators on import penetration, export performance productivity, market share and home demand since the publication of the Armstrong-Rees report.

Mr. Ridley: Yes, I received a letter from the chairman of the Statistics Users Council on that topic on 4 May 1990, 12 months after the publication of the Armstrong-Rees report.

Mr. Wigley: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the correspondence that he has received is critical of the present availability of indicators? Does he accept that there must be a proper, full background of statistical information if those involved in that sphere are to improve their performance? In view of our present balance of payments it is vital that all those tools should be available.

Mr. Ridley: I agree with the hon. Gentleman that an appropriate amount of information should be available to businesses, especially when they cannot get it from sources within the industry. Against that we must weigh the burden, cost and disadvantage of excessive form-filling on the part of businesses. However, in the light of representations from the chairman of the Statistic Users Council, I am prepared to consider with industry circumstances in which businesses want to fill in the forms so that they can obtain information when there is no other source of supply. In those circumstances, it would be right to go a little further than we have in the past.

Mr. Foreman: My right hon. Friend has spoken about meeting the requirements of industry. Would not we know more about that large balancing item in our external trade statistics, and about the real state of our economy, if we had more information? Is it not time that we improved the quality of our official statistics for precisely that purpose, as it would improve the quality of our economic governance?

Mr. Ridley: While the statistics that the hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) asked about are totally different from what my hon. Friend inquires about, I am all for having good statistics relating to the effects of economic policy. The difficulty with the figures that my hon. Friend mentions—which are really a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer—is that, while the figures for exports and imports tend to be accurate, what is not so clearly defined is how the captial account is made up—from what elements and in what proportions. How best to rectify that is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Chancellor.

Postal Service

19. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry when he next intends to meet the chairman of the Post Office to discuss the future of the postal service.

Mr. Forth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will meet the chairman of the Post Office, Sir Bryan Nicholson, on 21 May. They will discuss various matters of mutual interest.

Mr. Barnes: Will the Minister give an assurance that the national public monopoly on Royal Mail letters will remain? There is growing speculation that private companies are having discussions with his Department about that. We need to lay to rest once and for all fears that the Royal Mail and letters will go down the plughole, as water did.

Mr. Forth: The hon. Gentleman will be aware—as all Conservative Members are—of the undertaking given by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister during the last election campaign that the Royal Mail would not be privatised. We should bear that in mind.

I hope that the hon. Gentleman agrees that it is incumbent on Post Office management and on the Government to work together to ensure that the people of this country have the best mail service that the Post Office is capable of delivering. That is something which is constantly considered by Post Office management, as are its duty and responsibility. We are always prepared to look positively at any suggestions that it may make to ensure that the best possible services are delivered, now and in the future.

Sir Anthony Grant: When my hon. Friend meets the chairman of the Post Office, will he tell him in no uncertain terms that unless the Post Office can guarantee that a first-class letter will reach its recipient the next day, the Government will give it to someone else who can?

Mr. Forth: My hon. Friend is entitled to lay such a hard task upon the Post Office, but it would be unreasonable to ask the Post Office to do that in the near future. Not only is that not achieved in any other country of which I am aware, but it does not give tribute and credit to the Post Office for its stern efforts to improve the delivery performance, a target which the Post Office has set for itself. The Government and the Post Office management are looking closely at its performance, and I can assure my hon. Friend that we shall leave no stone unturned in seeking ever-better performance in the Post Office in future.

Ravenscraig (Strip Mill Closure)

3.30 pm

Mr. Donald Dewar (Glasgow, Garscadden) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make a statement about the imminent closure of the strip mill at Ravenscraig.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Malcolm Rifkind): British Steel announced this morning its intention to close the hot strip mill at its Ravenscraig steel works during the first half of 1991.

While this, of course, is a matter for the commercial judgment of the company, I must make it clear that I deplored the decision and its implications for the wo.k force. I am also very disturbed by the potential implications of closing the hot strip mill for the future of Ravenscraig as a whole.

As yet, British Steel has not provided any details as to why it believes that the closure of the hot strip mill is necessary. I very much hope that it will do so, as those affected are entitled to the fullest possible information. The hot strip mill has been a valuable asset for the company over the past three years and we are not aware why it has ceased to be so.

I also very much hope that British Steel will take all its work force at Ravenscraig into its confidence as to the longer-term employment prospects.

The decision announced by British Steel is not due to come into effect until the first half of next year. There is still, therefore, opportunity for the company to reconsider its decision and see the hot strip mill as an asset rather than as a liability.

The Scottish Office, naturally, regrets any decision that has significant adverse employment implications. As we would with any other major employer in Scotland, we shall seek to persuade British Steel to reconsider its proposal in the interests both of the company and of its work force.

Mr. Dewar: The Secretary of State has said that he deplores today's events. Will he join me in condemning a brutal announcement in uncompromising terms? Surely it is not enough simply to say that those who are about to die should be fully informed about the facts. The question is what is the Secretary of State prepared to do to recover the situation.

Does he agree that there is a strong case for the retention of the Ravenscraig strip mill in view of the growth in the European market and North sea activity? Is it not foolhardy to assume that the demand for strip products can be met by retaining capacity at only two plants? Is it not a decision based on a defeatist view of British Steel's prospects? Is it not essential that British Steel thinks again?

Does the Secretary of State accept that there is great bitterness about the way in which the work force has been betrayed by the company, but also dismay over the inactivity and spineless approach of Ministers?

Finally, will the Secretary of State tell the House why he did not meet Sir Robert Scholey for seven long and weary months? Those were the missing weeks and the dead days when damaging decisions were being taken and the Secretary of State was nowhere to be seen. Does he remember the Question Time promises on 28 March that a meeting would take place and as recently as 2 May that it would be shortly, yet those meetings never took place? Was not the fate of Ravenscraig strip mill worth the effort?

The Secretary of State told the press this morning that the future of Ravenscraig was not crucial to the future of the Scottish economy. Does he remember his speech at the Tory party conference at Perth almost exactly a year ago when he boasted that Ravenscraig had what he was pleased to call a new lease of life? He said:

"In the private sector the strip mill is working flat out, its order book full, its workforce fully employed."

What does the Secretary of State now say to the 770 people who are about to taste the misery of the dole queue and to the thousands of others who are frightened about their future? What consolation can they take from the Prime Minister's statement in a recent interview that she has a soft spot for the loyal work force at Ravenscraig?

I repeat the essential questions: will the Secretary of State give a guarantee that he is prepared to do everything he can to reverse this decision? Will he commit himself to fight now to stop closure being a threat to steel making at Ravenscraig when 1994 comes? Will he state plainly the steps that he intends to take to recover this disastrous situation?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the desirability of doing that which can be done to reverse the decision. I was interested that he emphasised what he believes are the strong commercial reasons for retaining the hot strip mill at Ravenscraig: the strength of the market for its products, the competitiveness of its work force and the superb way in which the work force has responded to the requests made of it. I agree with and endorse all that he said about that. I further agree that if there is a prospect of British Steel reconsidering the decision, the case must be put on commercial grounds and not on emotional or political grounds. I hope that all hon. Members agree with that.

The hon. Gentleman was correct to say that at various times in the House in the past few weeks the question of contact with British Steel has been raised. He will recall, if he wishes to consult Hansard, that that was with regard to new investment, and in particular regard to Dalzell and the plate mill. As I said at that time, the Government have presented to British Steel their own paper on the desirability of considering Dalzell for future plate investment. Far from delaying on these matters, they have been actively promoted in the past few months.

With regard to the relevance of Ravenscraig to the wider Scottish economy, I say to the hon. Gentleman what I have said on many previous occasions: I believe that the future of Ravenscraig is crucial to the economy of Lanarkshire because of the employment implications if it were ever to close. Of course it has significance and implications for the wider Scottish economy, but some 98 per cent. of Ravenscraig's products do not go to steel users in Scotland but are exported to customers elsewhere in the United Kingdom or overseas. The Scottish economy is infinitely stronger and more broadly based than 20 years ago, and it is sufficiently robust to deal with the problem to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

I do not suggest that the future of Ravenscraig is other than of crucial importance to the economy of Lanarkshire.

Clearly, an employer with thousands of employees in one part of Scotland has a particular role and responsibility in that respect.

Mr. Alick Buchanan-Smith (Kincardine and Deeside): May I assure my right hon. and learned Friend that Conservative Members support the robust line that he is taking, and we are grateful for it? Will he press British Steel very strongly about the commercial justification for this decision? Speaking from experience when I dealt with it in relation to the offshore oil industry, I did not find it enterprising in taking advantage of the opportunities of our own country and of those offshore. Will he impress on it the need to take advantage, in the interests of Scotland, of the opportunities that are available?

Mr. Rifkind: My right hon. Friend is correct. It is possible to suggest that the penetration of the British steel market by imports has in part been caused not by British Steel's lack of competitiveness but by its lack of capacity. When future investment decisions about plate and Dalzell are being made, that will deserve to be an important consideration.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): Will the Secretary of State acknowledge that, far from being robust, his performance in the House is one of great weakness? He should have foreseen that this was coming when the privatisation of British Steel was first mooted and should have undertaken then to secure the future of an independent Scottish steel industry which would not have been closed by a management that has never disguised its hostility to Ravenscraig. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman now give us some indication of the direct and positive action that he will secure to create an independent, viable, Scottish steel industry that will be competitive and secure for the long-term future?

Mr. Rifkind: I must remind the hon. Gentleman that, at the time of privatisation, British Steel gave a guarantee about the hot strip mill which expired only in 1989. Even under British Steel's current proposals, the hot strip mill will have continued in operation more than two years after British Steel's assurances have run out.

I remind the hon. Gentleman that British Steel announced in its prospectus at the time of flotation that it would be prepared to consider an alternative private sector purchaser for its assets if it had no continuing need for those assets in Scotand. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and I have drawn attention to the importance of that declaration, which may become increasingly important in the light of today's remarks.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): Will my right hon. and learned Friend accept that I am absolutely furious at British Steel's decision to stop one of the heartbeats of the Scottish economy? Does he accept that we owe it to a superb work force to do everything possible in the House and in the Government to keep the plant open? Has my right hon. and learned Friend heard whether any of the directors have resigned, in view of this disgraceful decision and the protests about it?

Mr. Rifkind: I do not have that information, but I happily endorse what my hon. Friend said about the quality of the work force. I have already had contact today with Mr. Brennan, leader of the shop stewards at Ravenscraig, and I look forward to meeting him and his colleagues in the near future.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): Let there be no doubt: Ravenscraig will fight this decision, and it will be right to do so. The Opposition will fight alongside Ravenscraig. It appears from the right hon. and learned Gentleman's answers that he does not have the stomach for that fight.

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman confirm that since October last year, despite pressure, he has not met the chairman of British Steel? Is that not a pathetic reflection on his attitude towards British Steel? Is it not a remarkable coincidence that the first time that the right hon. and learned Gentleman met the chairman was yesterday morning, to receive the news less than 24 hours after the closure of the Conservative party conference in Scotland? Why did he not listen when we warned during privatisation that British Steel planned privatisation in 1988, flotation in 1989, amputation of the hot strip mill in 1990 and closure thereafter?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman explicitly confirm his remarks this morning, when he said:

"I do not believe that the future of Ravenscraig is crucial to the Scottish economy"?

If the right hon. and learned Gentleman made that statement, it was one of appalling complacency. It makes him an accessory to this betrayal. He should either join us now in the fight or resign while he has a shred of intergrity left as Secretary of State.

Mr. Rifkind: My remarks this morning about the wider implications for the Scottish economy were identical to those that I made in the Scottish Grand Committee a year ago, and I stand by them entirely, for the reasons that I explained at that time. I repeat that I believe that the future of Ravenscraig is crucial to the Lanarkshire economy, for the reasons I gave. If the hon. Gentleman wishes to do a service to his constituents, rather than make political points he would be better advised to seek co-operation with all those on both sides of the House who would like British Steel to reconsider that decision. If the hon. Gentleman does not welcome that co-operation, he shows himself as being politically partisan and uninterested in the well-being of his constituents.

Mr. Allan Stewart (Eastwood): Will my right hon. and learned Friend bear in mind that the House has heard a great deal of rhetoric from the Opposition but not a single positive suggestion of a course of action other than that which he has rightly and properly announced to the House? Is it not deplorable that during this serious announcement several Scottish Labour Back Benchers were smiling and laughing? Will he further underline the importance of British Steel's obligation to offer Ravenscraig for sale if it has no further use for the plant? Does he agree that there is a danger that at some point in the future British Steel will make that decision but not make it public?

Mr. Rifkind: I agree with my hon. Friend that it is important that, at the appropriate time, British Steel honours the commitment that it gave in the prospectus. I understand that it still maintains that it sees a value in its assets in Scotland. We must point out to it that the credibility of that assertion is not assisted—indeed, it is seriously damaged—by its current proposals for the hot strip mill.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Does not the Secretary of State realise that his pleas that people unite behind him in a campaign to save Ravenscraig ring hollow because of his distinct failure to address the issue, despite former pleas from Members on both sides of the House? Is it not the case that he failed to recognise the investment starvation of the Ravenscraig works headed by British Steel and that he made no attempt to have a meeting with Black Bob Scholey to discuss the matter at an appropriate time and ensure that the investment was made? Is he not presiding over the death of the steel industry in Scotland? Is not the only option left to the Scottish steel industry to become independent? The market and the skilled work force are there and the people of Ravenscraig and Dalzell are the people who will build that industry, not the Secretary of State.

Mr. Rifkind: The first part of the hon. Lady's question would carry more conviction if the shop stewards at Ravenscraig had not reacted with absolute fury to the partisan conduct of the SNP and if the shop stewards and trade unions had not dismissed the SNP as political posturers with no real commitment to the well-being of the industry.

On the latter part of the hon. Lady's remarks, the question whether there could be a free-standing steel industry in Scotland with alternative ownership depends in part on the attitude of British Steel and whether other persons or bodies in Scotland or overseas would be interested in such an acquisition if it were available.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that the reason why British Steel has temporarily chosen to centre its works in Wales is that the Labour Government and the nationalised steel industry preferred to invest there? Is it not the case that they did so without the support of our party but with the support of the Scottish nationalists?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. and learned Friend is correct in his recollection of those matters.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Is not the figure that the Secretary of State gave—that Scottish industry used only 2 per cent. of the steel from Ravenscraig—a terrible indictment of the past 10 years' history of this Government? They have torn the heart out of heavy industry and manufacturing industry in Scotland. If he had any vision or intention of developing a manufacturing and heavy industry base in Scotland, he would recognise that we require the steel mill and more. As he has no stomach for the fight, will he keep it in mind that he should see himself not only as the Secretary of State of a Tory Government but as the spokesman for Scotland on this matter? He must work for Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: On the earlier part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks, I hope that he will be fair and will recollect that between 1974 and 1979 many thousands of steel jobs were lost. The Labour Government of the day accepted that that was commercially sensible and necessary. Indeed, it has been a feature of the steel industry under successive Governments of whatever political complexion that the battle to achieve competitiveness and commercial viability has led to that conclusion.

I endorse the thrust of the hon. Gentleman's latter remarks. If hon. Members on both sides of the House wish to have the maximum prospect of influencing British Steel, Scotland must speak with a single voice, and all those who have an interest in these matters must concentrate on sensible, commercial, mature arguments and resist the temptation to indulge in political back-biting which may give pleasure to their supporters but will be of little benefit to the well-being of the steel industry.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that, because the European regulations prevent any form of Government aid, there is no question of the Government being able to pump public funds into this concern?

Does my right hon. and learned Friend also agree that the productivity and work records of the work force and management at Ravenscraig merit them being told clearly what British Steel's investment programme is for the future of Ravenscraig, particularly slab production? Is it not also important that, if it does not give that information, British Steel should be instructed by all in politics in Scotland to get on with the job of offering the Scottish plants for sale, and then we shall see what commercial interests there are in carrying on productivity in Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: It is indeed the case that the rules of the European Commission preclude any member Government of the European Community from giving financial aid to primary steel production. On my hon. Friend's latter remarks, I endorse the view that the work force at Ravenscraig, who have responded superbly to the requests of British Steel management in recent years, are entitled to the fullest information from British Steel, not only about the reasons for the decision announced this morning, but about British Steel's future intentions for its plant and the livelihood of its work force.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): Is not the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that the announcement that he has made today is, to some extent—bearing in mind that it was a commercial decision—an indictment of the policy he has implemented in relation to the privatisation of the steel industry, where the Government have lost control of the situation? Would he further agree that he must not be too hard on the people of Ravenscraig if they are a bit emotional about their position? After all, their jobs and their ability to sustain their wives and families are on the line, and any hon. Member would be emotional about that. Does he realise that a spin-off from this will be a loss to British Rail, which depends on Ravenscraig for 40 per cent. of its freight? If the right hon. and learned Gentleman is serious about the fight, let us hear what he proposes to do. The problem will not go away as easily as the right hon. and learned Gentleman thinks.

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman is correct to refer to the understandably strong feelings of those who work at Ravenscraig. However, I remind him that it was Mr. Tommy Brennan, the shop steward at Ravenscraig, who appealed for an end to political partisan in-fighting, and for all the Scottish political parties to co-operate in seeking to press on British Steel that there was a good commercial case for investment in Ravenscraig and British Steel should have confidence in its future.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): All of us with British Steel works in our constituencies are concerned at British Steel's announcement today. While I applaud my right hon. and learned Friend's attitude, may I remind him that Corby steel works was closed down and today that town has over-employment, that Teesside has suffered its share of job losses, but today it is booming, and that only last week Consett announced a new and exciting venture and industrial park that will use integrated alternative energies and bring 1,300 jobs to that part of the world in the near future? Should not we stop looking backwards and start looking forwards?

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is correct to emphasise that, while the steel corporation was under public sector ownership, there were massive job losses in Consett, Corby and Shotton, under successive Governments, both Labour and Conservative. He is also quite correct to emphasise that the only real contribution that we can make to the well-being of the work force in the steel industry, whether in Ravenscraig or elsewhere, is to look to the future and put a commercial case showing why there should be investment and confidence in a particular steel plant.

Mr. Tom Clarke (Monklands, West): Is the Secretary of State aware that Members from steel constituencies such as mine will regard his statement today as pathetic and humiliating? Does he accept that neither he nor his hon. Friend the Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) is in a position to fight for Ravenscraig, given their posture during the closure of Gartcosh, which is where the story began? Will he further agree that his failure to defend the Scottish steel industry, in the light of the European straitjacket, of the lack of investment and of the experience in the North sea, where 41 per cent. of tubes and pipes used came from overseas, hardly qualifies him to fight for what is left of this industry? In view of the devastation that this announcement has heaped on my constituents and on the people of Lanarkshire in general, will he and the hon. Member for Stirling put their jobs on the line in the same tragic way as these people have done today?

Mr. Rifkind: I would have more time for the hon. Gentleman's remarks if he had referred to the major job losses in the steel industry during the period of the Labour Government of which he was such a conspicuous admirer. We all know that there have been major rationalisations in steel employment. The hon. Gentleman cannot expect to carry authority if he thinks that massive job losses under a Labour Government are acceptable but that, when they happen subsequently, they are to be condemned. He would do a service to his constituents if he concentrated on ways in which we can encourage British Steel to reconsider its position instead of indulging in the rather emotional hype that we have just heard.

Sir Hal Miller (Bromsgrove): Does the Secretary of State agree that this whole discussion shows how wise we were to privatise British Steel so that the additional investment is made in Wales and elsewhere according to the requirements of the market, and so that we get away from doing what the Labour Government did, which was to refuse to implement the closure of the Beswick plants, which led to tragic losses both of subsidy and of jobs and to the closure of steel firms in the west midlands?

Mr. Rifkind: I very much agree. My hon. Friend has rightly identified the proper approach.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): In the last few years the Secretary of State has been telling us that the Scottish economy is in good shape and on course to grow even stronger in the 1990s. How does he square that with today's closure and the loss of 800 jobs, or with the sustained withdrawal of investment from Scottish steel and the slow strangulation of the Scottish steel industry? Does he not recognise that an economy without the steel industry is like a car without an engine—it is going nowhere, which is precisely where he and his party are going unless they act to reverse this catastrophic decision?

Mr. Rifkind: The remarks that I made at new year have been more than vindicated by events since then. There have been continuing significant falls in unemployment; there have been massive new inward investment decisions which have been welcomed throughout Scotland; and the Scottish economy is now doing better than that of the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Does not a due sense of humility oblige my right hon. and learned Friend not to seek to substitute his own commercial judgment for that of British Steel?

Mr. Rifkind: That is a perfectly fair observation, but what I have said is not quite what my hon. Friend implies. I have said that if British Steel believes that there are good commercial reasons for reversing the view that it has taken over the past three years, its work force, who have responded splendidly to encouragement to increase productivity and competitiveness, are entitled to know what British Steel's commercial considerations are. So far that information has not been forthcoming.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): Does not the right hon. and learned Gentleman feel a sense of paradox in that the work force at this plant have been the subject of praise from him and others yet they now find themselves completely frustrated and unable to do anything but accept a decision made elsewhere? If he was only told about this yesterday, was not that an insult to his office, to the people who work in the plant and to the people of Scotland? If he was told yesterday, why did he not tell the House before?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. and learned Gentleman is talking nonsense, and he knows it. British Steel is a private company. I understand that the matter was put to the board on Monday, and as board members themselves were asked to authorise the proposal only on Monday I do not think that I or anyone else can complain about being informed on Tuesday.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Is it not the case that the health of the steel industry as a whole depends on management and not politicians making decisions of this sort? The sad truth is that there was never any economic justification for building the strip mill at Ravenscraig. Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the attitude of Opposition Members shows that their conversion to the market is wafer-thin? They are in favour of the market only in so far as it makes life easy for them. When it comes to the difficult decisions, they are always more than ready to jettison the market.

Mr. Rifkind: My hon. Friend is right. Only investment that has a commercial rationale is likely to stand the test of time. No one is doing any service to any part of the United Kingdom by wishing to maintain economic activity which requires massive subsidy and does not have an economic rationale.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): The Secretary of State is wrong to say that the closure affects only the economy of Lanarkshire, because the economy of my constituency and every other part of Scotland is affected by this tragic decision. I hope that he will bear that in mind. Given the problems of the Scottish economy and the fact that steel is a major part of it, it is strange that the Secretary of State has not met Bob Scholey. Will he tell us the reason for that? Only a few years ago an all-party Select Committee made an excellent case for Ravenscraig staying open. Perhaps the Secretary of State should refer to that report.

Mr. Rifkind: Of course I accept that there are implications for other constituencies arising from the decision about Ravenscraig. I in no way depart from my central propositon about the crucial importance of Ravenscraig to the economy of Lanarkshire; that is self evident.

The hon. Gentleman asked me about meetings with Sir Robert Scholey. I do not regularly meet the chairmen of major private companies in Scotland. I have meetings when they are required for a specific purpose. The hon. Gentleman will be well aware that over the past few weeks the main interest of the Houe has been in the future of Dalzell and future plate mill investment. Some weeks ago we submitted a lengthy paper to British Steel arguing the commercial case for Dalzell being the favoured location for investment in plate. British Steel is currently considering that paper and it will be necessary to have discussions with the company on its analysis of that.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that British Steel has been extremely successful during a period of reduction in the steel market throughout the European Community while we had steel quotas? Is he satisfied that Government subsidies to the Italian and other steel industies have left us with a level playing field? Are subsidies by other Euro Governments to their steel industries causing additional problems for the steel industry in Britain and especially in Scotland?

Mr. Rifkind: I certainly acknowledge the importance of my hon. Friend's point, which is primarily for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. My hon. Friend is correct when he says that British Steel has been very successful in winning new markets in Europe. It is precisely for that reason that Ravenscraig and especially the hot strip mill have been so fully utilised in the past three years. That is precisely why it has proved wise for British Steel to continue to use this valuable asset.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Is the Secretary of State aware that the squalid excuses that he has given constitute the weakest ever performance at the Dispatch Box? Will he explain to the Scottish people why, when we have an enormous market building up in the North sea, Scottish steel has been run down? Why has he failed to meet the chairman of British Steel, and why is he not putting his job on the line to defend the Scottish steel industry?

Mr. Rifkind: The hon. Gentleman would sound slightly more convincing if he would explain to the shop stewards at Ravenscraig why his view on the steel industry should be supported when every senior trade union spokesman in Scotland has dismissed SNP policy as positively harmful to the interests of his industry.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield) rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Was the hon. Gentleman here for the statement?

Mr. Smith: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: In that case, I can call him.

Mr. Smith: Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that, between 1975 and 1980, £3·3 billion worth of taxpayers' money was invested in British Steel, and that in the next five years the figure was £4·5 billion, but that during that period thousands of jobs were lost? Since then the British steel industry has been transformed and privatised. Is not one of the principal advantages of privatisation that management can now manage without political interference? Would it not be a grave mistake to go back on such a system?

Mr. Rifkind: If my hon. Friend is saying that it would be a grave mistake for political considerations to determine investment by British Steel or any other company, I entirely agree with him. It is important that the commercial arguments that may be used to justify a major closure should be fully examined. If British Steel is confident that it is justified in its commercial interpretation of the situation, there should be no reluctance on its part to discuss its reasons with its work force, which is most affected by the decision.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Has the Secretary of State no shame in coming to the House to call for a bipartisan approach to saving Ravenscraig when he and his colleagues spent two or three days in Aberdeen in an orgy of self-indulgence and eulogy on the Tory party and the free market? How can he call for a bipartisan approach when he has resisted such an approach to investment? Is the Department of Trade and Industry backing his approach to saving Ravenscraig?

Mr. Rifkind: The approach that I have suggested might be helpful to the interests of Ravenscraig is the approach called for by the shop stewards, and the one that the Standing Commission for the defence of the Scottish steel industry said would be in the interests of Scotland. If the hon. Gentleman is seriously interested in assisting the prospects for Ravenscraig, he must ask himself whether the kind of politically partisan remarks that he has made will help or harm the objectives which he says he desires.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Some weeks ago, I asked a question about the Scottish steel industry and the support that should come from the Government for the magnificent work being done by that industry in Scotland. The Minister for Industry accused me of leading with my double chin. Let us see leadership from the Secretary of State to ensure that we save the steel industry in Scotland. If he is unsuccessful, not only he but every Scottish Office Minister should resign.

Mr. Rifkind: I was waiting to hear whether the hon. Gentleman was offering to resign the representation of his constituency if he were unsuccessful in maintaining employment in a company in his constituency. I did not catch him making that offer.

Mr. Gavin Strang (Edinburgh, East): Does not the Secretary of State realise that this will not be seen as a commercial issue in Scotland because, even if it were in the commercial interests of British Steel to close the plant, it would not be acceptable to the Scottish people? People recognise that the steel industry is crucial to the long-term industrial future of Scotland. Is he not aware that it is all very well to have these reports of how the Conservative party in Scotland and Scottish Office Ministers will be leading a campaign against closure, but his Government presided over the decimation of the market for steel products in Scotland with the closure of the plants at Bathgate and Linwood and elsewhere and the rundown in the shipbuilding and engineering industries. His Government have paved the way to this decision, through privatisation. They should use the powers they took to privatise the industry to secure its future in Scotland.

Mr. Rifkind: By his intervention, all that the hon. Member has proven is that he is good at making political points but not much use to the steel workers in Ravenscraig.

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): I remind the Secretary of State of the informed view of Ian MacGregor, who said that a minimum of five steel plants was essential for the British steel industry. How can he say that today's announcement conforms with that informed view of the former chairman of British Steel? How is today's announcement of a partial closure at Ravenscraig compatible with the announcement by the then Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, the right hon. and learned Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), that, should Ravenscraig be threatened with closure, another buyer could be found? How can closure take place in such circumstances?

Mr. Rifkind: I am interested in the reported remarks of Sir Ian MacGregor, who clearly carries a great deal of authority on steel matters. It would be helpful if his views were seriously considered. British Steel—it was not only my right hon. and learned Friend—gave a commitment in its prospectus to make its assets available to an alternative purchaser if it had no further use for them.

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): Does the Secretary of State appreciate that British Steel's announcement is of considerable relevance to the steel industry in Wales? I appreciate the success of both Llanwern and Port Talbot in recent years, but does not the announcement mean a general scaling down of the steel industry as a whole, which could have a highly detrimental effect on the British economy?

Following the Budget, the Secretary of State mounted a successful rescue operation for the poll tax in Scotland. Will he do the same for Ravenscraig, or will he resign his high office?

Mr. Rifkind: I must leave my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales to comment on the implications of today's announcement for the Welsh economy. I believe that there is an opportunity for mature Scottish opinion to make its voice heard and to put forward a serious and sober case setting out why British Steel should reconsider on commercial grounds the decision that it is proposing to implement at Ravenscraig.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): Is the Secretary of State aware that Opposition Members are angry? To be honest, however, we are not surprised. When the Government were pushing the privatisation of the steel industry through the House, we in Scotland told them that the right hon. and learned Gentleman was washing his hands of the Scottish steel industry. Easter is past, but we still have a Pontius Pilate at the Dispatch Box. The hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) called upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman to resign; Opposition Members call upon him to resign. Indeed, the whole of Scotland will want his head if he lets British Steel pull out of Ravenscraig.

Mr. Rifkind: When a Labour Government preside over massive reductions in employment in the steel industry, Labour Members seem to find that acceptable and commercially necessary. They apply different criteria when they think that it is in their political interests to do so. The hon. Gentleman may impress himself, but not his constituents.

Oil Pollution (Devon Coast)

4.12 pm

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams) (by private notice): To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the devastation caused by oil pollution along the south Devon coastline.

The Minister for Aviation and Shipping (Mr. Patrick McLoughlin): At 15.09 on Saturday 12 May a collision took place between the Liberian-registered oil tanker Rosebay and the Brixham trawler Dionne Marie 14 miles south of Start point. Rosebay sustained damage to her port side, which resulted in about 1,100 tonnes of crude oil being spilt into the sea. The master immediately took action to minimise the extent of the spill, by transferring oil from the damaged tank into other tanks. Within 90 minutes the oil leak ceased. The marine pollution control unit was informed of the collision by Brixham coastguard at 15.25 and activated its counter-pollution aircraft at 15.30. The first aircraft began spraying at 18.00.

The marine accident investigation branch is investigating the collision. Its initial findings are that it was the duty of the fishing vessel under the international collision regulations to give way, but her watchkeeper did not see the tanker and made no alteration of course. The tanker took evasive action but it did not prevent the collision. Visibility at the time was approximately three to four miles. The MAIB report into the collision will be completed as soon as possible.

The dispersant spraying operations, which continued the next day, successfully dispersed 75 per cent. of the spilled oil. However, the remaining 25 per cent. emulsified with sea water to form an estimated 700 tonnes of what in the industry is called "mousse", which does not respond to treatment with dispersant. With natural breakdown that has now reduced to 400 tonnes. Had the dispersant spraying not taken place the original spill would have emulsified into some 3,500 tonnes of mousse. That would have had to be either recovered at sea—a difficult, slow, and weather-dependent process—or cleared off the beaches.

A joint Government-local authority response centre has been set up to direct and control the beach-cleaning operations. The area is difficult, with rocky cliffs and fast-flowing estuaries. There are several important amenity beaches, some bird colonies and an area designated as one of outstanding natural beauty. The MPCU is overseeing the preparation of detailed plans for clean-up by the local authorities. Appropriate techniques and storage sites have been identified.

The main beach-cleaning effort began at first light today. Local authority and MPCU equipment was deployed to appropriate access points during the course of yesterday evening. The main emphasis will be on the mechanical recovery of oil from amenity beaches and accessible rocky areas, pressure washing of hard surfaces and the eventual use of dispersants for final clean-up where that is essential. Much of the rocky areas will be inaccessible and the only option will be to watch for oil moving from those areas to more sensitive ones. Extra specialist personnel provided by the MPCU from the Warren Spring laboratory have been allocated to South Hams district council, which is bearing the brunt of the pollution. In addition, trained operators will accompany specialist equipment as it is deployed, to advise on use.

I pay tribute to the local authorities involved for their preparation, which enabled them to make a rapid response to what is obviously a major threat to an area of outstanding natural beauty. Their concern is shared fully by myself and local Members of Parliament. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) is on the Bench with me. It was because of the prompt action of the Department of Transport's marine pollution control unit that 75 per cent. of the oil did not reach the shore.

Mr. Steen: The oil spillage is a major catastrophe for one of the most beautiful parts of the country. I pay tribute to the Minister for alerting me to the problem and then keeping closely in touch with me as the progress of the slicks was reported to him.

The first problem is that although the damage has been curtailed to about 12 miles of the 88 miles of heritage coastline, which is a great tribute to the Government and the county council, it still means that 12 miles of beaches are saturated by oil. In one place—Challaborough beach, Bigbury—it is up to 18 in. deep. A great deal of work needs to be done. How will those involved disperse 12 in. of oil on some of the heritage coastline? Where will they put all the oil and sand that they clean?

Can my hon. Friend confirm that both public and private beaches will be cleaned and that some of the inaccessible coves will be approached by helicopter? Devon county council has said that helicopters are not available. Will my hon. Friend make them available if required? Will the services of the military be called upon if necessary? There are 700 commandos in my constituency, the Royal Naval college at Dartmouth and also HMS Cambridge. Will the military be called upon for immediate action should that be required?

There has been good co-ordination at local level, but to deal with the mousse once it has landed on the shore, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food needs to issue a licence. Devon county council and South Hams district council fear that getting a licence out of MAFF may mean a further delay. Can my hon. Friend help with that? There are five fine estuaries as well as a number of other inlets. Is everything being done to ensure that oil does not get up the estuaries?

The area is one of the finest in Britain for the tourist industry. Will my hon. Friend say something about that industry and about what will happen to those whose livelihoods have been affected by this terrible spillage? As to the remedial action that is being carried out by his Department, Devon county council and South Hams district council, to which I pay tribute, will the Minister confirm that no cost will fall on the community charge payer and that the Government will find ways of funding it entirely from the centre?

This is a catastrophe of a type which has never happened to this coastline before. We have to learn something about the cause.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is a question to the Minister. The hon. Gentleman might apply for an Adjournment debate to make all these points.

Mr. Steen: I am grateful to you for your guidance, Mr. Speaker.

Does the Minister intend to investigate not only the cause of the accident but whether oil tankers should be lying along the south Devon coastline for many hours? Should not some of the larger oil tankers have double skins to protect them from such a collision? Will the Minister say something to the people of south Devon to help them deal with the terrible tragedy?

Mr. McLoughlin: I shall try to respond to the many points that my hon. Friend put to me. I can understand that the cost, and the matter of who will meet it, will cause concern to my hon. Friend's constituents. I give him a total assurance that the cost of the clean-up operation will be met entirely by the polluter. There is insurance cover on the tanker. There will be no cost to community charge payers. I am sure that my hon. Friend and his constituents will be grateful for that. It is in line with Government policy that the polluter should pay for the damage that he does. That is an important point, which needs to be made.

If there are any problems about getting agreement from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, we shall be ready to help. We have already obtained from the Ministry the permission that is necessary to use dispersants. We keep in close contact with the Ministry. I do not foresee any difficulty, but if there is, we shall take it up.

Special action is being taken to try to safeguard the estuaries. My hon. Friend has rightly pointed out a great difficulty in that there are a number of estuaries in the area. A great effort is being made to protect them by putting booms across to try to stop the oil going up the estuaries.

Tourism is an important point. It is impossible to give a definitive estimate as to when all the oil will be cleaned up, but I very much hope that within two weeks we shall have restored as best we can some of the worst affected areas. I assure my hon. Friend that the restoration operation will apply to the whole coastline. There will be difficulty in the more inaccessible parts, which are rocky and treacherous. Obviously, we could not put anybody in danger. My hon. Friend asked about the use of helicopters. That will be considered. If it is thought the most appropriate way to help, we shall take advice on it.

My hon. Friend asked about the use of the Army. At the moment we feel that there are enough people and facilities in place. However, should we think it necessary to call on the resources of the armed forces, that option is open to us, but we do not yet feel that that is necessary.

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): Does my hon. Friend accept that serious though the incident is—it is very serious, particularly in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen)—if prompt action had not been taken by the marine pollution control unit, we would have had a massive environmental disaster, stretching not just along the Devonshire coast but along the coast of Cornwall? Will my hon. Friend deal with a point that he did not answer? Will he assure the House that there will be a thorough inquiry into how the collision took place?

Mr. McLoughlin: I join my hon. Friend in congratulating the marine pollution control unit, headed by Captain McLeod, and the people who work in it. There was a very prompt response. The unit was informed at 15.25 and was spraying at 18.00. If it had not been for the speed of the response, the position would have been more serious, as my hon. Friend said. I assure my hon. Friend, as I said previously, that an accident investigation is being carried out at the moment and that any lessons that can be learned from it will certainly be learned.

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Above all, I welcome the Minister's statement that the polluter and not the poll tax payer will pay. Will he confirm that the polluter will be prosecuted if any offence has been committed, and that that is being actively investigated? There has been a comprehensive response but sadly it has not been sufficient, and it has not stopped damage to the environment. To that extent, the response has without doubt been too little, or too late, or both. Therefore, given that the estuaries are now at risk as well as the coastline, will the Minister say what action is being taken? I understand that booms are not restraining the oil but have been breached, and that oil is now going up into the estuaries on the Devon coast. Is action being taken to deal with that as well as the other matters that I mentioned?

Mr. McLoughlin: We have been given constant prophecies of doom and gloom by the hon. Gentleman. He started on Monday with a question on energy, telling us that the community charge payer would have to pay. If he had taken the time and trouble to investigate and to find out the facts, he would have realised that that is not the case and that the polluter will pay. It is typical of the hon. Gentleman to say that the response is too little, too late. As far as he is concerned, anything that was done would have been too little and too late. I regard setting up an operation within two or three hours of the incident being reported as very effective. We have 3,000 miles of coastline to protect around the United Kingdom and the Department does an excellent job in protecting it.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): My hon. Friend knows that people who live and work along the Devon and Cornwall coast lie in fear and trepidation of such events, and we are grateful for the speed with which the problem was tackled. Will my hon. Friend investigate the links between oil companies and detergent companies? Is he aware that many detergent companies are owned by oil companies, so the companies that create the problem in the first place make a profit out of trying to clean it up? Will he study his files? He mentioned Warren Spring laboratory. If he looks at the old files, he will see that I tried and failed some 16 years ago to get the Department to take seriously an invention by one of my constituents, who was driven out of business because oil companies wanted to go on selling detergents rather than see my constituent's Oil Mop company come to successful fruition. Will he carry out a full investigation so that at some time in the future we may be able to prevent people who have a commercial interest in selling detergents from having a first crack of the whip and let those who have the technology lift oil from the water at an early stage before it comes ashore?

Mr. McLoughlin: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. All the responses to deal with such problems are directed by the marine pollution control unit. It says what should be used and charges the polluter for any costs incurred by the Department of Transport.

I cannot accept some of the theory behind what my hon. Friend said—that somehow masters of oil tankers and other vessels go all out to cause collisions so that companies can benefit from the clean-up operation. Such accidents are serious and it is to the master's credit that he immediately switched tanks to stop any further spill going into the sea. Of course we shall investigate any complaints that my hon. Friend draws to our attention. However, I congratulate those involved on what has been a fairly successful operation. It has not been totally successful. I wish that it had been, as it would have saved us all a lot of trouble and it would also have prevented some devastating effects on the coastline. We regret that there has been pollution, but I assure my hon. Friends that everything is being done to ensure that that pollution is removed as soon as possible.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): The Minister said that the polluter will have to pay. Is he aware that this has the makings of a long-drawn-out legal wrangle? The case of the disaster off Alaska is still being resolved in the courts and the case arising from the disaster off Birkenhead has not yet been settled. I cannot imagine that as there has been a collision there will not be contending parties who will say, "It is not my fault." The Government have a responsibility not to stay at arm's length, but to make it abundantly clear to all those working for local authorities in Devon and for other organisations that might have to foot the bill, that while the wrangling is going on in court, the Government will ensure that money is in place. Otherwise it will be paid for in the community charge. The Minister has to answer those questions so that people in Devon fully understand the consequences.

Mr. McLoughlin: Not only is the vessel insurance cover about £8 million, but the United Kingdom is a member of an international organisation that provides compensation of up to £30 million for oil pollution. I do not think that the Alaska oil spill was covered by such an international agreement.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Will my hon. Friend comment on the availability of resources to the marine pollution control unit? It clearly acted with the utmost speed, but it may not have had sufficient resources to saturate the problem. Will he have discussions with the armed forces, particularly the Navy, to see whether the pollution dispersant can be made available to them at immediate notice in the same way that helicopters are made available for sea rescue? Can my hon. Friend assure me that the slicks will not reach Dorset? Finally, if the fishing vessel, not the carrier, is shown to have been at fault, will the insurance held by the carrier compensate those affected?

Mr. McLoughlin: An investigation is going on and it would be wrong for me to apportion blame at this stage. The dispersant is on 24-hour standby and a number of planes which I inspected two weeks ago, are already part of the marine pollution control unit and on standby. We have also substantially increased the number of hours flown around our coastline for observation purposes. Therefore, quite a lot is being done in that regard. Ships were on their way within two hours, so that was a satisfactory response. However, we are always ready to learn from any incident.

Mr. Jeremy Hanley (Richmond and Barnes): My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) is fortunate in representing one of the most beautiful constituencies, and one that I visit every year. However, I am worried by my hon. Friend the Minister's statement earlier that the fishing vessel may have been at fault. If so, any amount of insurance that is carried by the oil company will be worthless and there will be legal wrangles. The hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), in one of his rare gleams of sense, has put his finger on the important point of who will provide the money while the matter is being sorted out. Will my hon. Friend take a personal interest in the matter and visit the site so that he can experience at first hand its natural beauty? Perhaps he can fly over the site in a helicopter to see the extent of the damage.

Mr. McLoughlin: I am assured that in this case the polluter will pay and that there will be no problem about the recovery of the money. That is the best advice that I have. I was in Devon last week, admittedly in north not south Devon, but I am only too well aware of the outstanding beauty of the area.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): In response to the hon. Member for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce), the Minister said, doubtless in good faith, that he hoped that everything possible was being done, but is not the anecdotal evidence that some of us have from the North sea coast that the marine pollution control unit is chronically and seriously under-resourced? May we have any facts that the Minister has on the amount of money that has been spent on it, what the estimates are for a proper unit which, sure enough, will be needed sooner or later, how that will be achieved and what, in the view of his expert advisers, is the shortfall? This is a serious issue.

Mr. McLoughlin: I reject what the hon. Gentleman has said. I am satisfied that we have an effective marine pollution control unit, which responded within a short time of being notified. Within five minutes of the head of the unit being told of the incident, an aircraft was flying to the site. Had it not been for that speedy reaction, we should be dealing with a far more serious incident.

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I am grateful for the opportunity to question the Minister on this subject. However, I hoped that his hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport would be present to issue a statement on the tragic deaths of four railway workers this morning on the Metropolitan line. Perhaps a note could be sent to me about that.

The House is grateful to the Minister for announcing an inquiry into the Rosebay incident. Can he say whether the Liberian authorities have agreed to co-operate? Will he publish the report, and will he ensure that the inquiry examines the level of crewing on the tanker and establishes whether their skills and training were adequate for accident prevention and were properly employed on this occasion? Can he confirm that the tanker was in its correct navigational lane? After similar incidents—for example, the Amoco Cadiz and Torrey Canyon disasters—separate tanker lanes were enforced, reducing the danger of tankers passing near to land.

Does the Minister agree that the devastating effects of the accident might have been avoided if the tanker had had a double skin? There is growing international support for a requirement for all tankers to have double skins, to avoid oil spillage. Will he join me in condemning the economic expediency that rejects such measures, and puts profits before the protection of the environment?

The Minister will be aware that discussions are taking place in the International Maritime Organisation about whether vessels weighing more than 150 tonnes should carry their own oil spill response plan. Will he give us the Government's views on that proposal, which Opposition Members believe could limit appalling environmental damage and the economic threat to the all-important tourist area of Devon?

Mr. McLoughlin: Let me repeat that an accident investigation is in progress, and of course its report will be published, as is normal with marine accident investigation reports. Its initial finding is that, under international collision regulations, it was the duty of the fishing vessel to give way. However, the watchkeeper did not see the tanker and therefore did not alter his course. The tanker took evasive action, but could not prevent the collision. Visibility was three to four miles. I hope that the report will be completed as soon as possible. I have already given its interim findings. The quick action of the master of the Rosebay prevented what could have been a much more serious accident, given the amount of oil on the ship.

The hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) referred to double skins. I accept that that is an important matter, and it is being investigated by the IMO. However, it would be no good trying to apply such a requirement unilaterally. The IMO is conducting a detailed review of technical standards and the procedures that apply to tankers. Double skins may not be the only answer; I have been advised that there are serious problems with gas build-ups.

Caernarfon Hospital

4.39 pm

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely, the only casualty unit in the town.

"The closure at the end of this week of the Caernarfon hospital casualty unit"—

The matter is specific as it arises from the recent decision to close Caernarfon cottage hospital—the sixth hospital closure to be announced in the county in the past 12 months—but it has assumed greater importance because we had expected the closure to be phased and that there would be some co-ordination of alternatives, but the casualty unit is to be closed this week. We learned yesterday that the general practitioners who are expected to cover for the closure have not agreed on how that cover is to be achieved.

The matter is important because, obviously, mothers of children who have accidents and need urgent treatment do not know where to go, and given the short notice of the closure, there has been no opportunity for the town to be notified about the alternative arrangements, and in some circumstances it could be a matter of life and death.

The matter needs urgent consideration because of the stampede by the health authority, acting without proper co-ordination and public information. No doubt co-ordination has been badly affected because of a senior secretarial strike taking place this week, arising from the failure of the authority to negotiate a proper salary settlement. The problem arises largely from the chaos in the health authority, which has a £4 million deficit this year and is in a mad panic, closing wards and services in all directions.

The responsibility for that must be identified. If it is the fault of the health authority for its failure to manage its affairs, quite frankly, the health authority managers should resign. Alternatively, it is the fault of the Welsh Office for failing to provide the health authority with adequate resources and for failing to insist on proper strategic planning of services.

The casualty unit closure is a blow to the town of Caernarfon, causing considerable difficulty in the area. It requires urgent debate. The Welsh Office Ministers must come out of their bunker and face up to the health shambles for which they must take ultimate responsibility.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Caernarfon (Mr. Wigley) seeks leave to move the Adjournment of the House under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that he thinks should have urgent consideration, namely,

"The closure at the end of this week of the Caernarfon hospital casualty unit."

I have listened with care to what the hon. Gentleman has said about this important matter, which affects his constituency. As he knows, I have to decide whether to give it precedence over the business set down for today or for tomorrow. I regret that in this case the matter does not meet the criteria of the Standing Order. I cannot, therefore, submit his application to the House.

Amusement Machines (Protection of Children)

4.42 pm

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): I beg to move,

That leave be given to bring in a Bill to empower local authorities to prohibit in their area the use by children of amusement machines.

There is good support from both sides of the House for a measure along the lines of what I am proposing. That may not be immediately apparent from the number of hon. Members in the Chamber, but I know that I can muster good support for the measure should it come to a Division.

The Bill aims to give local authorities teeth to deal with the serious problem of arcade addiction. It is right that the Bill should specify the age of 16. If local authorities felt that the problem was serious in their areas, they would be given powers to ban those under 16 from amusement arcades. Young people under 16 are not yet responsible for their own actions and need guidance from adults. Sixteen is the right age limit and will achieve maximum support in the House.

We have legislation to protect those under 16 from under-age drinking, smoking or buying cigarettes and solvent abuse. More recently, measures have been introduced to prevent them from using chatlines. We should also protect them from the evil of gambling.

I have been involved in the campaign against under-age gambling for at least two years. The misery caused by addiction to amusement-with-prize machines in arcades is real among young people and their families. Many cases have been brought to my attention in Norwich and in all parts of the country. I am grateful to the National Council on Gambling, Westminster city council and the associated amusement arcades action group and other organisations for bringing all those cases to my attention. There are on record cases of theft, attempted suicide, broken homes, child prostitution and more serious crimes as a result of arcade addiction. Many hon. Members, including my hon. Friends the Members for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) and for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Pollok (Mr. Dunnachie), have had serious cases of arcade addiction brought to their attention.

Arcade addiction is more serious than official statistics suggest. Even on the basis of Home Office figures, as many as 1·3 million out of 5 million children in the 10 to 16-year-old age group are spending money on amusement-with-prize machines. Of those, at least 250,000 children could be gambling in arcades unaccompanied by parents or friends. A recent survey conducted by the Gaming Board for Great Britain showed that, of 151 arcades visited in 1987, 94 were admitting under-16s and 53 of them were members of the British Amusement Catering Trades Association. Yet there is a code of practice that seeks to prevent under-16s gambling in arcades. In spite of that, the code of practice is still being flouted and that is why legislation is necessary.

I do not want to place too much emphasis on statistics, but the facts call into serious question the view taken by the Home Office that a change in the law is unwarranted. I do not agree with that view and I am most grateful to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department for being present to listen to my ten-minute Bill. I have had the opportunity to discuss the matter with him on a number of occasions. However, I commend the various initiatives that the Home Office has taken with local authorities and with BACTA. The display of notices outside amusement arcades and the code of conduct are good practice. I thank the Home Office for its support to that extent, but I seek to persuade my hon. Friend and his colleagues in the Department that a change in the law commands good support in the House, and I hope that the Bill will eventually be enacted.

In Norwich there are very good liaison arrangements between the education and youth services, the social services, the city council and the police, in dealing with arcade addiction. But all those initiatives do not address the main issue. Access to arcades is all too easy for young people, many of whom are also playing truant from school. The figures are extremely disturbing, but time does not permit me to go into detail on that serious connected issue. The attraction of the bright lights is causing young children to go into the arcades and gamble. Even if the numbers were small—it is difficult to ascertain the exact numbers because so many of the cases that have been brought to our attention have been confidential, as families do not seek to publicise the problem—there is a real risk of serious addiction and it is important that we should address it.

Under present legislation, potential arcade operators have to apply to local authorities for permits and for planning permission. The wording of schedule 9 of the Gaming Act 1968 makes it more difficult for a local authority to refuse to renew a permit than to deny an applicant a permit and planning permission in the first place. Local authorities are therefore wary of refusing to renew permits unless they are denied access to inspect or unless there are serious problems with the operation of the machines.

That is why I believe that it is sensible to give local authorities discretion, as the Bill seeks, to ban under-16s from amusement arcades should they feel that the problem is serious in their area. It is reasonable to make the age limit of 16 a legal requirement.

Acceptance of the Bill would bring amusement-with-prize machines and arcades in line with the law on other forms of gambling. The distressing cases that have been brought to my attention and to that of other hon. Members provide all the evidence that is needed to justify the Bill or a similar measure, and I commend it to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. Patrick Thompson, Mr. Jack Aspinwall, Mr. Andrew Bowden, Mr. Simon Coombs, Mr. Derek Fatchett, Mr. Tony Favell, Mr. Paul Flynn, Mr Roger Gale, Mr. Conal Gregory, Mr. Kenneth Hind, Sir Charles Irving and Miss Ann Widdecombe.

AMUSEMENT MACHINES (PROTECTION OF CHILDREN)

Mr. Patrick Thompson accordingly presented a Bill to empower local authorities to prohibit in their area the use by children of amusement machines: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time upon Friday 8 June and to be printed. [Bill 142.]

Questions to Ministers

4.53 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. One of the ways of calling Ministers to account is by raising on the Floor of the House the difficulties that one encounters.

I have recently tabled a series of questions to the Department of Employment. Often the question produces the rubric, "I will answer this question as soon as possible." I give plenty of time—generally a week—for a priority answer to a written question. The Department is evading responsibility for immediate answer to the House when information is sought for a particular purpose and by a particular date. I raise this matter in the knowledge that successive Speakers have deprecated any unnecessary, planned or deliberate delay, and I wish to re-emphasise the importance of that.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): I join former Speakers and Deputy Speakers in deprecating such action, and I shall make a point of looking into the matter.

Orders of the Day

Finance Bill

(Clauses 3, 9, 10, 20, 23, 25 and 68)

Considered in Committee [Progress 15 May.]

[MISS BETTY BOOTHROYD in the Chair]

Clause 20

CARE FOR CHILDREN

4.54 pm

Mr. Paul Boateng (Brent, South): I beg to move amendment No. 40, in page 11, line 6, at beginning insert—

'( ) In section 154(2) of the Taxes Act 1988 after "section 155" there shall be inserted "or section 155A."'.

This is a technical drafting amendment designed to meet a surprising omission by the Government draftsmen. I trust that it will be accepted by the Government in that spirit. It is entirely helpful and non-controversial.

The Chief Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Norman Lamont): One of the most exciting things that can happen in a football match is when, with the first kick of the ball, someone scores a goal. I am happy to thank the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) for his suggestion.

Amendment No. 40 is not technically correct, but it identifies a defect in the Bill. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for moving it and I undertake to table an amendment on Report to deal with the omission.

Mr. Boateng: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Boateng: I beg to move amendment No. 41, in page 11, line 6, at beginning insert—

'The following section shall be inserted after section 131 of the Taxes Act 1988—

"131A. Where an employee makes a contribution out of his emoluments towards the cost of the provision of childcare, and the conditions set out in section 155A below are satisfied in respect of such care, that contribution shall be regarded for the purposes of section 198 below as an expense wholly, exclusively and necessarily incurred in the performance of the duties of his employment."'.

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With this, it will be convenient to consider the following amendments: No. 25, in page 11, line 6, leave out from second 'section' to end of line 10 and insert

'144 of the Taxes Act 1988—

Care for children

144A—(1) Notwithstanding any other provisions of the Taxes Acts the provision for an employee of care for a child or the financing of such provision by any means (including vouchers redeemable only for such care and reimbursement of the employee's expenses incurred in procuring such care) shall not be treated as an emolument chargeable to income tax under Schedule E if the conditions in subsection (1B) below are met.

(1B) The conditions are that—'.

No. 5, in page 11, line 10, at end insert—

[The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means]

'( ) the employee is not a person to whom section 154(1) applies by virtue of his being employed as a director of a company or in employment with emoluments at the rate of £25,000 a year or more.'.

No. 6, in page 11, line 13, at end insert—

'(aa) the care is provided primarily during the employee's working hours in the employment by reason of which it is provided.'.

No. 26, in page 11, line 14, leave out sub-paragraphs (b) and (c) and insert—

'(b) the care is provided on premises which are not the normal place of residence of the child or employee.'.

No. 13, in page 11, leave out lines 14 and 15.

No. 7, in page 11, line 15, at end insert—

'(bb) the care is provided under arrangements which are equally available to any other employee of the same employer whose child has an equal or greater need of such provision and for whose child it is practicable to make such provision.'.

No. 27, in page 11, line 21, leave out subsections (2) and (3).

No. 42, in page 11, line 21, at end insert—

'(e) in the case of close companies (as defined in section 414 of the Taxes Act 1988), child care facilities of a broadly similar nature are made available by the employer to all employees (this condition will be satisfied even if not all employees make use of the facilities so provided.)'.

No. 43, in page 11, line 21, at end insert—

'(f) at premises where child care facilities are provided, they must be of a broadly similar standard.'.

No. 8, in page 11, line 25, at end insert 'and'.

No. 9, in page 11, line 27, leave out from 'persons' to end of line 30.

No. 10, in page 11, line 28, after 'employer', insert 'or an associated company of the employer'.

No. 16, in page 11, line 29, leave out 'and managing the provision of the care.'.

No. 11, in page 12, line 25, at end insert '"associated company" has the meaning given in section 416 below;'.

No. 12, in page 12, line 29, after 'educational', insert 'or recreational'.

No. 17, in page 12, line 30, leave out 'eighteen' and insert 'sixteen'.

No. 14, in page 12, leave out lines 31 and 32.

No. 18, in page 12, line 37, at end insert—

'(3) This section shall operate to relieve the taxable benefit from basic rate tax only. The benefit is still to be charged at the excess of higher rate over basic rate tax.'.

Mr. Boateng: I am obliged to the Chief Secretary for his kind words, but I do not intend to allow them to go to my newly exposed head. I fancy that he is unlikely to be so welcoming to these amendments.

The amendments, sadly, are necessary as a result of the defective and stunted clause 20, which the amendments seek to improve. It is defective and stunted because the Government have been the subject of two competing forces. The first is an impulse, for public relations purposes, to appear to be doing good, in this case to hard-pressed parents, and women in particular, who are at a tax disadvantage when they are in receipt of child care benefits from their employer. They are the recipients of what the Government would have us believe is their largesse.

The second competing force is a compulsion that characterised every aspect of the Budget—to do as little as possible at minimal cost. We therefore have this push-me-pull-me provision, which fails to address the central issue of removing obstacles to the provision of workplace nurseries and child care provision for working parents.

Given the past of the Chief Secretary, it is perhaps not surprising that clause 20, which he will seek to defend this afternoon, is stunted and defective, because at every turn he has opposed the reasonable suggestions made by Labour Members on every Finance Bill since 1985 to overcome the hurdle to the expansion of child care provision for working parents. He fought us tooth and nail, and the last time that he replied to a debate on this anomaly in the taxation rules he was scathing of the arguments ably and convincingly put forward by my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith). He told us—and he will remember the debate well:

"There is no reason to believe that the present tax treatment of child care expenses is a barrier to the employment of women with children."—[Official Report, 11 July 1989; Vol. 156, c. 894.]

On 11 July 1989, there was apparently no reason to believe that a barrier existed, yet today he accepts that there is a barrier, which the Government are belatedly seeking to remove. We look forward to learning what changed his mind.

We must not look a gift horse in the mouth; we are glad to see the Chief Secretary in his place at all. He was not present yesterday; he left it to his minions, pleasant and engaging though they are, to do the business. We are entitled to ask why the right hon. Gentleman has taken the time out this afternoon to address the Commitee on this issue. It may well be that he does not trust the Economic Secretary or the Financial Secretary to resist——

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle-upon-Tyne, East): Understandably.

Mr. Boateng: My hon. Friend is being slightly, and uncharacteristically, uncharitable. I am sure that the Chief Secretary trusts his colleagues' understanding. Indeed, he fears that their understanding is such that they may concede the reasonable points that he has already heard and that he knows will be forthcoming not only from the Opposition but from at least one Conservative Member. Not trusting them, the right hon. Gentleman has come here to ensure that there are no concessions.

5 pm

We should not be surprised that Conservative Members speak with a forked tongue about child care. I do not mean to be unkind—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."] Well, perhaps on reflection, I do mean to be unkind. We have become used to such behaviour by Conservative Members. Indeed, there is a game that can be played, "Spot the quote". One wins a prize—a day out in the Kingsway day nursery, surrounded by photogenic children and attentive staff—if one can say who said what.

Let us look at some of the comments that Conservative Members have made about child care. First, there is this advice on how working mothers might be helped:

"Can they in fact go out at all at that stage in their children's life"?

Should not

"several women get together and arrange that one looks after the children while the others work part time"?

I wonder who said that. Any offers from Conservative Members? It was someone to whom they should pay attention—indeed, someone to whom they must pay attention day in, day out. The Chief Secretary suffered more in that respect than any other person. It was, of course, the Prime Minister, no doubt speaking from her vast experience while other women took care of her children as she practised part time at the Bar and practised part time as a politician. [Laughter.] One may well laugh, because the right hon. Lady did not ever practise part time in that way, nor did she come to a cosy relationship with other part-time working mothers to look after her delightful twins.

Another well-known Conservative Member said:

"If they want or need help in this task they should make the appropriate arrangements and meet the costs."—[Official Report, 12 July 1988; Vol. 137, c. 150.]

Who said that? Any offers from Conservative Members? It was not the same lady but none other than the hon. Member for Derbyshire, South (Mrs. Currie)—a figure from the past, but one who speaks with the authentic voice of many Conservative Members when talking about child care.

There is another example, and this is the choice quote. There is a double prize for any Conservative Member or, indeed, any Opposition Member—I shall extend the offer—who can guess who said this:

"I don't think the State should step in to help the working mother unless her life has collapsed."

Who said that?

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): The chairman of the ministerial group on women's issues.

Mr. Boateng: Indeed, it was none other than the right hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), whose job is to chair the ministerial group on women's issues. That comment shows the attitude of Conservative Members to working mothers and to child care. If they come to the Dispatch Box expecting us to be thankful for clause 20, they have another think coming. We are here to bury these little Caesars, not to praise them, and they should be under no illusions about that.

We need to reflect on the response by those who have the responsibility for the day-to-day care of children and those who have the responsibility for the day-to-day management of these facilities. What is their response to the largesse in what the Government would have us believe is their generous little clause? The Busy Bees consultancy works with companies that are interested in subsidising child care in order to help them establish child care provision, and it is doing important and valuable work. The managing director states:

"This tax exemption will not in the end benefit anything like the numbers of employees we had originally hoped. Only employees of very large companies stand to benefit. Many firms have a need for 10 or 20 places, for which it is not economically viable to set up a nursery. With very little more imagination, a lot more could have been achieved."

Why has that imagination not been applied to what the Chancellor described as this small supply-side measure? It may be a small supply-side measure, but it gets smaller by the hour. The orchestrated fanfare that greeted the Chancellor's comments on this measure would have led people to believe that we would be dealing with a growing number of workplace nurseries and other forms of child care provision based in the nursery. That has not happened. The 3,000 children who benefit from existing workplace nursery provision are unlikely to be joined by large numbers. We are not tackling the demographic time bomb in relation to women at work and not freeing parents to maximise their contributions to the economy.

This is not just a child care issue or educational issue, although it is both; it is also an economic issue. It is about maximising the pool of skills if our economy is to go forward, but the Government have failed in that respect.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: I shall give way in due course because I know that the hon. Gentleman has a valuable contribution to make.

The scale of the problem shows that it is all that much more of a pity that the Government have missed this opportunity. A survey by the Department of Employment and the Training Agency found that only 198 of the 1·1 million persons surveyed had kids in employer-provided creches. That is the scale of the inadequacy of existing provision. Only 3 per cent. of the institutions or organisations surveyed provided workplace nurseries, with only 20 in the private sector and the rest in the public sector. Despite the trailing of this measure in the run-up to the Budget, only 5 per cent. of the companies surveyed even considered establishing a workplace nursery.

Hon. Members ask whether this measure effectively encourages employers—even the 5 per cent. who were considering it—to take the plunge. We must reach the sad conclusion that it will not, because it fails to have the flexibility necessary to bring about the expansion that we all seek. That flexibility would enable companies which wish to provide nursery places to buy them in existing community nurseries and to choose between what local authorities and the voluntary sector offer. Companies would be able to buy places and in so doing encourage the expansion of existing provision.

Companies are specifically excluded from doing that under clause 20 as it is presently drafted unless they can show that they are involved in the management and financing of centres. That is why we tabled amendment No. 9. I hope that the Minister will concede that our amendment would enable his provision to have the effect that it should have of expanding the present supply of workplace nurseries and places for the children of working parents in nurseries.

We look to the Minister to make an early response on this matter and to concede that our amendment will have the effect that I have outlined. If not, we shall have no option but to press amendment No. 9 to a Division. It is absolutely vital if we are to succeed in expanding child care provision.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I agree with the hon. Gentleman's general sentiments, but why is he willing to accept so many of the Government's own restrictions, such as the rule that nursery care cannot be provided on domestic premises? Will he bear in mind the fact that many well-organised playgroups start in domestic premises? If the hon. Gentleman accepts so many of the Government's restrictions, rather than supporting the type of amendments that I have tabled and the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) has tabled, he will leave the Bill restricted.

Mr. Boateng: We know that the Chief Secretary has set his mind against any expansion on that scale. As the hon.

[Mr. Boateng]

Gentleman rightly says, our amendments are modest. We ask not for the world but merely that the Chief Secretary accept amendments which are within the spirit of the Chancellor's Budget statement.

At the end of the day and at the beginning, fiscal measures such as the Government propose are not the best and certainly not the only way of providing the level and standard of child care that we seek. There is no alternative to a comprehensive child care policy. There is no substitute for a policy that is designed to maximise choice and flexibility for working women while maintaining standards at all times. We are not prepared to tolerate a policy by which the Government simply seek to meet the economic needs of the time and to overcome the demographic time bomb. We are not prepared to sacrifice the life chances of young children. We do not believe that that is right.

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West) rose——

Mr. Boateng: That is why we say that the Government should attend to the generation and release of resources to enable local authorities to play the co-ordinating role that we believe that it is right for them to play. Local authorities have the necessary expertise and know-how. They are ideally placed to exercise a strategic function in the provision of child care. We want to hear the Government's proposals on that matter.

Should we take it that the Government's only concern is a minimal extension of child care provision by the means that they have outlined, which would involve little effort or attention from the Government? Do they cling to the mistaken belief—the Chief Secretary expressed it on 11 July last year—that the market will mysteriously meet the needs of children and working parents? There is every reason to believe that it will not.

Mr. Tim Smith: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: Simply by mentioning the word "market", I have prompted an immediate response from the die-hard monetarists who still lurk on the Conservative Benches. I feel obliged to let the hon. Gentleman have his say.

Mr. Smith: It was the word "mysterious" that prompted me to intervene, not the word "market". There is nothing mysterious about the way in which the market will work. If employers want to employ more mothers and women, they will make the necessary arrangements. The market will accommodate them.

5.15 pm

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman may say that that will happen, but the Confederation of British Industry, which is certainly aware of the mysteries of the market, calls more and more frequently on the Government to intervene to moderate the operation of those mysteries, which seem to work so obviously against the interests of the British economy. The Institute for Fiscal Studies specifically warns against some of the measures promoted by the monetarists. I make no apology for mentioning the CBI or the Institute for Fiscal Studies. Why should a Treasury Opposition spokesman apologise for calling in aid of our case the CBI and the Institute for Fiscal Studies? It is a sign of the extent to which Conservative Members have slipped from reality, with regard not only to child care but to the economy.

We are committed to a comprehensive child care policy.

Mr. Stern: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Boateng: In due course.

Our amendments must be seen in that context. I hope that the Chief Secretary will address himself to amendment No. 41 specifically and assure us that it is acceptable. Surely this matter should not divide or stretch the consensus of the House. It seeks to recognise the position, which will not be uncommon, when provision is made by an employer for child care but the employer says to the employee, "We expect you to make a contribution." It seems right that in those circumstances the philosophy that underlies section 156(1) of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 on contributions that might be deducted from benefit should apply and the employee should not have to pay tax on the part of his or her emoluments that goes towards child care provided by the employer. That does not seem unreasonable. Certainly it does not make excessive demands on the Treasury. We look to the Chief Secretary to take that on board at an early stage in his reply.

All the experience of recent years is that unless measures are taken to encourage employers to make provision for child care and to facilitate take-up by employees, the hoped-for expansion in child care simply will not take place. We want that expansion to take place, for the benefit of the child and of the economy. It is in that spirit that we have tabled the amendments and look for a positive response from the Minister.

Mrs. Teresa Gorman (Billericay): It ill behoves the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) to berate the Conservative party on any change of mind because his party has changed its mind on so many policies in the past 10 years that it is hard to keep up with them. It has changed its mind on nationalisation and council house sales, and has practically ditched clause IV—the backbone of its philosophy. It is squirming around trying to find some new policies and has hit on the woman's vote as one opportunity to make hay while the sun shines in the lead-up to the next election.

Nevertheless, I find myself largely in sympathy with the amendment tabled by the hon. Gentleman, most of all because it is an almost straight crib from my recent ten-minute Bill. Labour Members knew from my discussions with them that my ten-minute Bill attracted enormous attention, not least from trade unions, which wrote to congratulate me on the forward-looking views of the Conservative party in making such a point to the House.

I received a number of letters from women who said that they had never before written to a Conservative Member of Parliament, but were absolutely 100 per cent. behind the Conservative party as the party moving such ideas into the public arena. Even the National Union of Teachers wrote to me congratulating me on my success in the House of Commons. It wrote to tell me that there was a major shortage of teachers in schools and 400,000 qualified teachers, inactive at home, looking after children. It said that it greatly welcomed the Conservative party's initiative in putting that fact in the public arena. It is the Conservative party that is at last putting that principle into legislation, with clause 20.

My only quarrel with clause 20 is that it limits the opportunity for employers to pay for workplace nurseries to the workplace itself. My amendments seek to expand that idea so that an employer may pay for child care provision other than at the workplace, but in a formally constituted nursery. That would mean that a mother would not have to take her children to her workplace, but could leave them near home in a nursery, knowing that they were properly cared for and having the peace of mind to go about her job for the rest of the day.

I am sure that, when the Treasury decided to make this concession, it did not realise that it was so limited in scope and that perhaps only about 3,000 women stood to benefit. I hope that today we can persuade my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary that it would be equitable to expand that provision so that a great many more women can have that opportunity.

At present, the proposal is also limited to large employers who can afford to pay for a workplace nursery. I wish to extend it so that a number of small firms can combine to use nursery places. That would stimulate the growth not only of new nurseries but of the labour force available to small businesses. It therefore falls in with the pattern of Conservative Administration ideas to stimulate the market economy.

I understand that the Treasury will be concerned about the likely cost of such a concession. I appreciate that the Treasury does not like opening up new tax allowances, but we give tax allowances for things of which we approve. The Conservative party is the party of home ownership and gives tax allowances on mortgage interest. We are the party that, recognising the importance of pensioners building up savings as they grow older, has given tax allowances on those savings so that they can be added to income and allow pensioners to be self-supporting. In the past, we have also agreed that it is a good idea to encourage people to have meals during their working day, so we give a tax allowance on meal vouchers. The principle of tax allowances in support of things in which we believe is thus a well established practice in Conservative philosophy.

I estimate that the concession to allow a nursery to be provided somewhere other than at the workplace would cost about £25 million—a small amount of money—for one year. What is more, that money will come back to the Treasury, partly through the increased economic activity of women going to work and partly from the taxes collected on the prosperous new nurseries stimulated by imaginative extension of the principle. The Treasury, which usually anticipates a 100 per cent. loss on any concession, could thus look forward to a gain in revenue if the idea were extended to a broader spectrum of women.

As the first woman to speak in this debate, I wish to consider the matter from a woman's point of view. There is nothing new about married women with children going out to work to supplement the family income. That has been done for generations. In poorer families, women often went out to do domestic work. In the cotton towns of the north they provided much of the labour in the factories.

The needs of modern society have widened the type of work available, and the changing status of women, for which we have all fought in the past 50 years, has meant that many of them choose to carry on some form of paid work outside the home. Every girl these days earns her own living between leaving school and getting married. Some undertake a long training and become so absorbed in the subject that they want to continue that work after marriage. For many of those girls, the sort of work involved in running a home is insufficient to use all their abilities and they feel that they are not working to their full capacity.

Some men I know are far too ready with the phrase, "a woman's place is in the home", forgetting that their own daughters will almost certainly earn their living outside the home, and that some of them will want to carry on their careers. While they condemn women in careers in round terms, they would be thrilled if their own daughters were to achieve those new career heights. The choice is up to the woman—if she has no particular interest and finds work in her home satisfying and absorbing, clearly she will develop her interests in that centre. If she has a pronounced interest in some other direction in which she has already achieved some measure of success, it is essential for her own satisfaction and the happiness of her family that she should use all her talents to the full.

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): I am sure that the hon. Lady would not wish to suggest—if she does, it is incorrect—that women, whether married or not, do not have the right to economic independence in their own right. Their right to pursue their careers, whether or not they have children, should not be frustrated by the lack of child care facilities or some out-of-date idea that once women marry they should be satisfied to stay in the home and not have economic independence in their own right.

Mrs. Gorman: I certainly agree with the hon. Lady that women and their families should be able to make provision for their own needs, and it should not be a matter for state intervention. However, there should be tax provision, as I am arguing.

People in general, apart from men with working wives, are often unsympathetic to working wives. It is a pity that so many women with young children have to be out of their careers for 10 years or more. After 10 years it is often hard to pick up again, especially if it is scientific work because things change and develop so rapidly.

"It would make a tremendous difference if part of the expenses of employing other people to run her home were allowed against tax."

I must make a confession—those are not my words, but the words of a working woman in the 1950s. Clearly, she is a woman with hands-on experience of the problem and great sympathy for the woman's point of view—a woman's woman. The woman concerned was, of course, our great Prime Minister and I hope that as First Lord of the Treasury she will seek to influence the thinking of the Treasury in this respect. I am sure that Treasury Ministers will wish to broaden these measures to include a much wider spectrum of women, just as I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, whose sentiments are clearly my own in these matters, would wish them to do so. All women who go to work will benefit from such an extension.

5.30 pm

Mrs. Sylvia Heal (Mid-Staffordshire): I welcome the opportunity to make my maiden speech in the House. In so doing, I am mindful of and will respect the traditions and customs of the House. I should like to record my thanks to right hon. and hon. Members and to the staff of the House for their warm welcome, many offers of help, numerous pieces of advice and several offers of pairing.

I should have liked to enter the House under different circumstances, and I wish therefore to pay tribute to my predecessor, the late John Heddle. He was a Member of the House for a decade and he represented the Mid-Staffordshire constituency following its formation in 1983. I extend my sympathy to his widow and family. Although I did not have the privilege of meeting him, I know from comments made by my constituents that he was regarded as a man who worked hard and conscientiously to represent them. I am sure that he is missed by his former constituents, and not least his family.

I look forward with enthusiasm and confidence, however, to the challenges that the electors of Mid-Staffordshire have given me. My constituency was formed by the Boundary Commission in 1983. It is a long, narrow constituency stretching from the north to the west midlands and it is not based on a single community. It is predominantly rural, but it contains three main towns.

Lichfield is a pleasant cathedral town and the birthplace of the wit Samuel Johnson, who dubbed it a city of philosophers. In the middle of the constituency is Rugeley, a predominantly industrial town dominated by two power stations and a mine. Thirty miles to the north lies Stone, a canal-side market town which has attracted a wide variety of national and international companies.

During the time I have been associated with Mid-Staffordshire, I have learnt why the people there have a pride and affection for the area, which many right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House visited during the election campaign. Indeed, the influx of so many politicians and representatives of the media gave a mini-boost to the local economy which was much appreciated.

Although peace and tranquility have returned, many of the problems in the area remain. The constituency is set in the heart of middle England and comprises industrial, commercial and rural concerns, with large housing estates, small picturesque hamlets and a work force of professional, managerial and skilled people, so it can rightly be seen as a microcosm of the United Kingdom. That is why the issues that concern my constituents affect the whole country. The continuing increase in the rate of inflation is bringing misery and a hard financial struggle to many home owners and making it impossible for others to get a foothold on the property ladder. Industry is looking for more stability to give it the confidence to plan ahead for the investment and growth that are essential for the prosperity of us all.

The Health Service and education were also issues in the election campaign, but one issue came to dominate it and it would be remiss of me not to mention it. I refer to the poll tax—the harshest, most regressive and unfair tax to be imposed on the British people in more than 600 years. It is misleading to pretend that the rebate system offers any real protection because even the least well of will have to pay a minimum of 20 per cent. The many debates and Divisions in the House on the poll tax have resulted in a majority for the Government, but I find my views best summed up by Dr. Johnson, who said:

"Though we cannot out-vote them we will out-argue them. They shall not do wrong without it being shown to themselves and to the world."

Today we have been debating workplace nurseries, which are meant to provide access to employment for parents. There is, however, another group of people for whom access to employment is difficult—people with disabilities. The Office of Population Censuses and Surveys records the fact that about two thirds people with disabilities depend on state benefits. Because of the additional costs incurred from chronic illness and disability, this means that many face added problems in trying to live on an inadequate income, which further affects the quality of their lives.

The current benefit system is both chaotic and unjust. It should be replaced by a single system of assessment of disabled people and their carers. Benefit should be paid according to need, not according to how people became disabled or whether they were in employment at the time. Only 31 per cent. of all disabled adults of working age are employed, compared with 69 per cent. of the general population. That is certainly not due to any lack of motivation or ability—it is due to lack of opportunity. Many of us take the challenges and rewards of employment for granted. Those who have experienced a period of unemployment will know that it brings not just a loss of income but a loss of dignity, self-esteem and social contact.

Even if people with disabilities have the qualifications and expertise to do a job, they have to overcome discrimination on the grounds of their disability. Studies conducted by the Spastics Society in 1986 and 1989 provide scientific evidence to back up what disabled people know from their own experience—that they face discrimination often from the moment of initial inquiry about a job. The Spastics Society's research shows that two in every three valid applications from candidates with a disability will be treated in a discriminatory way.

The society attempted theoretically to place a secretary in appropriate vacancies advertised in newspapers. For each position, two applications were sent and similar characteristics were described in each letter, except that the applicant's disability was mentioned in only one of them. Nearly twice as many interviews were granted when the disability was not mentioned as when it was. Such results spell discrimination in capital letters.

Discrimination means seeing an applicant's disabilities rather than his abilities, and although many employers would like to behave in a more socially responsible way, they fail to recruit people with disabilities because of ignorance and fear that it will involve them in extra work, expense and special consideration. Yet often these are small considerations such as a handrail, a ramp, a flashing light on a phone, or a lower desk or work bench. For some, the requirement may not be a physical adaptation of the office or factory but a flexible working pattern—flexi-time or part-time working.

It is important to make a distinction between physically and mentally disabled people, because people recovering from mental illness often face even greater hurdles when trying to return to employment. The illness or breakdown may have been a long time ago and the person may be completely recovered, but although the person may have the best qualifications and the right experience for the job, a history of mental illness can lead to the second-best applicant getting the job.

It is not only the private sector which fails to employ disabled job-seekers. Government Departments and, with some notable exceptions, local authorities also fail to meet the quota set in the 1944 Act. In view of demographic changes, skill shortages and the challenge of 1992, the Government should be taking a lead in ensuring that there are no obstacles to encouraging people with disabilities to enter or return to the employment market with appropriate schemes of rehabilitation and training. However, that in itself is not sufficient. Having acquired skills and regained their confidence, the hopes of such people are dashed when the door of opportunity to employment remains closed. I am convinced that, if real progress is to be made in providing equality of opportunity for people with disabilities, a more active approach by employers is necessary and legislation to outlaw discrimination is an important step.

It has been a privilege to address the House and I thank hon. Members for the courtesy that they have extended to me. Following my success in the by-election, I was reminded of the words of Aneurin Bevan when he said:

"Election is only part of representation. It becomes full representation only if the elected person speaks with the authentic accents of those who elected him"—— or, in this case, her.

"That does not mean he need be provincial and that he speaks in the vernacular. It does mean he should share their values, that is, being in touch with their realities."

I believe that I share the values of the people of Mid-Staffordshire and I shall endeavour to represent them in the House to the best of my ability for a long time to come.

Mr. Stern: I am delighted to have this opportunity to follow the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mrs. Heal) in what the whole Committee will agree was a most distinguished maiden speech. We are grateful to her for her kind and perceptive comments about her predecessor, who was well liked by all hon. Members As the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) knows, because she is another veteran of attempts to define disability benefits when we sat for many hours in Committee on the 1985 and 1986 Social Security Bills, I am delighted to welcome an hon. Member who has such a clear and deep understanding of the issues that are involved.

My two words of warning are, first, that the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire should not assume that on subsequent occasions she will be surrounded by so many of her hon. Friends and, secondly, that any mention of pairing will inevitably give rise to about 150 letters arriving in her pigeon hole.

My speech is a breach of about four years' silence on Finance Bills, because it is the first occasion on which I have had the opportunity to speak on a Finance Bill since last year, when I ceased to be a PPS. I shall take the opportunity to support what the Government are trying to do by way of the clause and to oppose the thinking behind some of the amendments. As the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) said, I share with Ministers something of a Damascene conversion on the clause, because for years I was opposed to the principle of workplace nurseries. However, I have come to support it because the form of tax relief proposed in the clause will achieve the limited objective that has been set out for it.

5.45 pm

The clause is not designed to provide general tax relief for child care. If it did, I and many hon. Members would be wholly opposed to it. It is designed to do what a new tax relief can at the right time and place and on occasions achieve. It will give a limited nudge to an existing market in order to help it expand without at the same time distorting that market. If we were to give the tax relief that is blithely set out in amendment No. 41 or, I regret to say, in the amendment spoken to by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman), not only would we not achieve the objective of the clause, but we would set up a vast new distortion for about one third and what we hope will eventually be almost a half of the working population. No system of tax relief should be designed to do that and I should not support such a system.

The hon. Member for Brent, South made several blithe assumptions. He has fallen into a trap, as so many people do when looking at a particular tax relief. He looks at what the tax relief would cost and what it would achieve, assuming no change in circumstances. However, it is plain that if tax relief of the range and extent that he proposes in amendment No. 41 were to be given, it would affect not a few thousand people but a few million, and it would affect them to the extent of what is probably their greatest living expense.

My estimate—I invite the hon. Gentleman to challenge it—is that to give tax relief to all working mothers, or to working fathers when they have the responsibility, on what they have spent out of their income on child care would cost several billion pounds. So much for the value——

Mr. Boateng: The hon. Gentleman invites an immediate response. Will he give way?

Mr. Stern: I shall do so in due course. I assure the hon. Gentleman that I shall give way to him more quickly than he gave way to me.

Amendment No. 41 deals with an employee making a contribution, which will be determined by that employee, towards the cost of child care. The other conditions in the clause would then have to be satisfied. Apart from the provisions in the clause, there is no limit to the size of the contribution that the employee could choose to make. One assumes from the wording of the amendent that the employee could spend up to the limit of income. We read with some surprise the document that came from Walworth road yesterday because it says that there will be no uncosted pledges. However, any pledge of this nature is wholly uncosted because it is wholly uncostable. We read that all pledges about future public spending would have to be based on what the economy could afford. Within 24 hours of that document being issued, we have heard a pledge that I assume will cost the Exchequer several billion pounds. I shall now give way to the hon. Member for Brent, South.

Mr. Boateng: I do not want to interrupt the hon. Gentleman's flow, but he pushes me and I am happy to answer him. He misunderstands the import of amendment No. 41, either unintentionally or mischievously, and seeks somehow to undermine the good sense of the provision. The amendment seeks to deal with a relatively rare but important occurrence when an employer provides a work-place nursery for his employees. He would provide such a place within the restrictions of the current clause and would then require the employee to make a contribution. Let us take a fairly typical example from the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mrs. Heal)—the Busy Bee nursery. My hon. Friend is to be congratulated on her excellent maiden speech.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I appreciate that the hon. Member was invited to intervene, but I hope that he will not make a second speech at this stage. He must remember that this is an intervention.

Mr. Boateng: That is why I was reluctant to intervene. I was brought to my feet by a Conservative Member. I shall deal with the example when I wind up the debate. The hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) is misdirected and his ideas are misconceived.

Mr. Stern: I look forward to the hon. Gentleman making his second speech.

The amendment says nothing about an employee being required to make a contribution. It refers merely to an employee making a contribution. As several of my hon. Friends have pointed out, the hon. Member for Brent, South has eschewed the invitation, as no doubt he will again when he winds up, to put a cost on the amendments. So we see, within 24 hours, yesterday's Walworth road document being discredited.

We are not talking about general provision of child care with tax relief, nor should I support such a move because the cost would be astronomic. We need to decide what we mean by child care to realise how astronomic the cost would be. People think, particularly when they read the briefings with which we have been showered, that when we talk about providing for child care we are talking about something that is done through a workplace nursery or through a registered child minder. However, we must take it into account that that is only a tiny proportion of child care as it is borne by most families and principally by most women.

For example, many local authorities have estimated over the years, although no reliable research is available because of the nature of the subject, that unregistered child minding vastly exceeds registered child minding.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): The hon. Gentleman fails to take into account the fact that, if one provides facilities and allows tax relief for those who put children into child care, one creates further taxpayers because people are able to go to work. Secondly, what is his authority for making such an outrageously incorrect statement about child minding?

Mr. Stern: The hon. Gentleman is being disingenuous. I challenge any Opposition Member to deny that when we are talking about unregistered child minding, we are talking about something which, by its very nature, cannot be measured. It can only be estimated by the local authority officers who have the job of providing care. Unregistered child minding has been known to exist for many years, and tax relief cannot deal with it. In many cases, it is accompanied by a failure to declare income on the part of the child minder and I am told by social security officers that they find, when they catch up with cases involving unregistered child minders, that it is accompanied by a failure to deregister for benefits. That is one aspect of the problem that we are nowhere near tackling.

Even that aspect is dwarfed by those who bear the greatest share of child care—not workplace nurseries or registered child minders, but relatives. In countless families in my constituency, the woman or, much less frequently, the man, is able to go to work because a grandparent or another relative is prepared to care for the child without tax relief or payment but as a matter of normal family duty. I should regard it as grossly unfair if we were to give a huge tax privilege—one far beyond the purpose of the clause—to those who choose to use commercial arrangements, while not providing an equivalent incentive to those who act as families have acted for thousands of years.

Mr. Anthony Coombs (Wyre Forest): In 1980 a survey on women in employment was carried out. I should have thought that the trend of more women going to work since then has reinforced the point of the survey. It found that not only did 34 per cent. of working women use the child's grandmother as the main support for child care while at work, but 44 per cent. of full-time working mothers used grandparents and a further 13 per cent. used their husbands.

Mr. Stern: I endorse what my hon. Friend said, which underlines my point. We are talking about a limited tax relief. If we extend it to all those who lay out what one might call declarable money on child minding, we shall create a huge distortion in the market.

My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay has tabled an amendment that has been backed by a number of, one assumes, disinterested organisations such as the Institute of Directors. Although my hon. Friend and I often find ourselves in a minority in defending libertarian principles and protesting when we feel that Governments are going too far, on this occasion I am wholly in disagreement with her because what she is suggesting is nothing more than a tax farm. It will enable wealthy individuals to print alternative money in the form of child care vouchers, which inevitably in many cases will not be spent on child care, but will form another black market. There will be no way to police the way in which the child care voucher is spent, or whether it is spent on child care. I remind her of Gresham's law, which says that bad money tends to drive out good. Her amendment would create a large sum of bad money.

I welcome the clause because it will give a limited push to what, for many people, is a welcome development. That is the involvement of the employer in making it easier for particular employees to take on particular jobs. If the new tax relief works, it will be self-limiting, because it will apply only to a limited number of people in a limited number of circumstances. To go beyond the purpose of the clause would be an expensive folly with unbounded social effects. For that reason, I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will have no hesitation in resisting the amendment.

Mr. Beith: I am delighted to congratulate the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mrs. Heal) on a most effective maiden speech, well prepared and well delivered. The hon. Lady's remarks showed a breadth of knowledge about the problems of the disabled which I hope that she will bring to the House on many occasions in the future. I am sure that it will not be long before she makes her second speech. My only piece of advice to her is that in some ways the second speech is more difficult than the maiden. The indulgence of the House, which is automatic when a Member makes his or her maiden speech, disappears thereafter.

I hope that what happened to me when I made my second speech late at night does not happen to the hon. Lady. When I rose, I was mistaken by Mr. Deputy Speaker for one of my colleagues, who was sitting in the Cafeteria at the time. When his name appeared on the annunciator screen, he was presented with the dilemma of whether to enter the Chamber and make a speech or whether to continue eating his meal. That is unlikely to happen to the hon. Lady, however, as she is easily recognisable and has made such a distinctive and valuable start to her career in this place.

Child care provisions urgently need to be extended. Child care is important because women who choose to work outside the home should have the freedom to do so. I emphasise "choose" because I do not think that we should be pushing women in either direction. They should not feel pressure to work outside the home, but neither should they feel that they ought not to do so. One of the effects of the poll tax, with its joint and several liability, will be to make many married women who do not have an income feel that they must have one because they have a liability but no income. The state should be neutral and married women should have a free choice. Barriers as preventive as the lack of adequate child care should not stand in the way of women who choose to work.

There is a crying need in the economy for the skills of many women, and that need will become greater in the next few years. That is widely recognised, and the industry has pressed strongly for amendments of the kind that I and the hon. Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) have tabled. Perhaps the hon. Lady is more radical than members of the Labour party, but that comes as no surprise to me. Indeed, I have always known that to be the case. I must be careful, however, because she attacked me and others the other week for being Christians, so I know that I am in trouble with the hon. Lady already.

Mrs. Gorman: In the speech to which the hon. Gentleman refers I criticised theologians who have extreme views, not Christians.

Mr. Beith: I suggest that the hon. Lady reads the report of her speech to see how wide she appeared to range on that occasion.

A much wider child care policy needs to be established than that which can be achieved within the framework of the Bill. There must be greater support for local authority nursery provision and greater support and provision for the voluntary sector. Provision should be extended to out-of-school facilities for children. The provisions that we are discussing, which are limited, appear not to extend into that third area.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science took an initiative on out-of-school provision and wrote to 25,000 schools in England urging them to consider using their facilities for child care provision out of school hours. So far, the groups campaigning for this provision have found only about seven schools which have managed to make a response. That is hardly surprising, given the financial pressures that schools are facing. It will take more than a letter to 25,000 schools to deal with a problem which will remain for many women even if all the provisions that the Government have set out in the Bill are implemented, improved and tidied up.

Children of school age must be provided for and cared for when they finish school each day and during school holidays. The provisions set out in the Bill do not meet that need. In considering successive Finance Bills, we have campaigned for wider tax relief for child care, but the Government have not provided it. We are talking today about tax relief for workplace nurseries. In that respect, the Government have given the Labour party that for which it asked. It has been given precisely that for which it campaigned.

I vividly recall a debate which took place during consideration of the 1989 Finance Bill in Committee. I was telephoned by a representative of a campaign which had been mounted for workplace nurseries and told off in no uncertain terms because I intended to raise in Committee —as, indeed, I did—the wider question of tax relief for child care. I was told that the Labour party intended to raise the issue of workplace nurseries on Report and that those responsible for the campaign did not want the matter to go any wider than that.

I pursued my amendment and the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) dealt with the issue thus:

> "Unfortunately, the Democrats"— his word, not mine—

> "have mixed up the issue with the much broader issue of tax relief for child care expenses in general."

He was referring to nursery provision. He than said that > "the new clause fails to take into account the principal mechanism whereby assistance can be given for child care, which is to ensure that good quality nursery provision by employers, local authorities and voluntary organisations is made available on a much wider scale than it is at present. Furthermore, child benefit should properly reflect the costs of bringing up a child."

Shortly after that, he said:

> "The new clause would use tax relief instead of dealing with those problems. Therefore, we cannot support it."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 22 June 1989; c. 623-4.]

The hon. Gentleman was addressing the argument that it is inappropriate to use tax relief to secure wider child care. Even the clause that we are seeking to amend uses tax relief to encourage employers to provide workplace nurseries. The crux of my argument is that the workplace nursery can never be more than an extremely limited solution to the problem of child care for working mothers. The Government's tax relief efforts must therefore be devoted to wider objectives. Even now, the official Opposition's amendments severely restrict the range of relief and, oddly, do not even relate it to the standard rate of tax, As the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) said, the clause is almost unbelievably limited in its scope.

If, as I hope, the House of Commons introduces a workplace nursery for its staff—those employed by the House of Commons Commission—it is doubtful whether Members could send children to it, and it is certain that journalists, BBC staff and those who work for the Department of the Environment in this place would not be able to obtain tax relief for vouchers that their employers might provide to send children to the nursery. Even though all the employees to whom I have referred work within this building, they would not be able to send their children to the nursery because their employers would not be providing or managing it.

That is an extreme example of the degree of restriction implicit in the clause. On the face of it, a building or set of premises used by several organisations could not have a workplace nursery used by all the organisations unless they were all fully involved in its management. That would seem to be pretty difficult nursery to run. A nursery run by the House of Commons, all its Members, the BBC and most daily newspapers in the land would be pretty difficult to run. I should not like to work for such a wide range of employers.

I have provided an extreme example, but I will move on to a more common state of affairs. Let us suppose that there are several firms on a trading estate which have factories nearby. One quite large firm might say, "We think that we could manage to operate a workplace nursery. We could probably take up half the places for our employees and we shall offer the other places to some of the neighbouring firms so that we can bring the total number of places to a reasonable level. We shall then have their support and the vouchers that they give to their employees." Such a scheme would fall foul of the narrow provisions of the clause, yet it would be a natural arrangement for several employers with premises fairly close to one another. The Government's provisions fall down even in that example of workplace nursery provision.

Even the widening to which I have spoken would not meet the needs and position of many people. There are so many employers who cannot reasonably provide child care at the workplace. There are employers who have many sites with only a few employees at each one. That is certainly true in retailing, and the same can be said of manufacturing services industries. There are firms with many employees who work in scattered locations throughout the country or even around a city, and they will be unable to make workplace nursery provision.

Small businesses with relatively few employees could not reasonably make child care provision. It would not be economical to provide the facility because they would not have enough employees to take it up. Even quite large firms—firms employing perhaps 100 people—might be uncertain about the level of take-up in any one year. The obvious solution for many firms is to look to others to help them. In this way the Government are failing to observe their philosophy, ideas and principle.

The Government propose to set up an anti-private-enterprise scheme. Let us suppose that a Government Department with many sites throughout the country wants to make nursery provision. It might decide to invite an outside catering contractor to provide services at a site where it might not be economic to run its own catering services. If the Department has a location where there are relatively few employees but where another provider could make nursery provision available, it would be unable to privatise its nursery provision. Under the Bill, it would have to manage the nursery provision itself. Given the Government's philosophy, what is the sense in saying that in the public sector the Government have to manage everything?

Mr. Bermingham: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that another spin-off is the advantage to the large organisation at the expense of the small? I always thought that the provision was meant to encourage small organisations, but it fails to do that.

Mr. Beith: That is undoubtedly so. My earlier argument was that employers with a small number of staff cannot possibly undertake the sort of workplace nursery provision that would be sustainable for a period of time. Many of them could more usefully provide tax-free vouchers to the employee, provided that they were used for registered child care or nursery education and could be redeemed only by an organisation or individual registered for that purpose.

Mr. Timothy Raison (Aylesbury): What would be the equity of providing vouchers for those who go out to work while providing nothing for those who stay at home and look after their children?

Mr. Beith: The whole point of the argument that has run through the debate is that, in order to have the freedom to go out to work, many mothers have to provide for child care out of their taxed income. The Government are saying that they will make provision for those with child care facilities on the premises where they work without that being subject to tax. A great many other mothers will have to pay for child care out of their taxed income because the employer cannot assist them in any untaxed way. Those who choose to look after their children at home do not face that barrier.

The right hon. Gentleman may believe that the state should not become involved and that there should be no tax relief. If so, he should oppose the clause. However, once we enter that area—and there are many good social and employment arguments for so doing—we have to find a more sensible scheme. There appears to be greater equity between those who have access to workplace nurseries and those who do not than the right hon. Gentleman described.

The amendments attempt to go wider. They are all based on a voucher principle which allows child care to be provided in a wide range of locations, including domestic locations. I am worried that under Labour's proposals it would not be possible for a playgroup in an individual's home, properly registered and operating, to be the subject of vouchers provided by an employer. A skilled, trained and qualified nursery nurse looking after several young children would not qualify under the Opposition's proposal, still less under the Government's.

We must have a reasonably flexible approach because many women, especially those travelling a long way to work, will not want to take their children to some urban centre for child care. It would be more sensible and reassuring if their children were looked after in their local community by people whom they know and where there is access to neighbours and friends should anything go wrong. If a child is taken ill, a neighbour or friend could provide reassurance and take the child home for the rest of the day.

That is another example of how the workplace nursery is of limited help. It is obviously valued by those very few women, as a proportion of the total, who have access to workplace nurseries. Even where such nurseries exist, quite a few women still choose to make other child care arrangements. We must allow for them, and the amendments are designed for that purpose. If we do not provide for them, we shall have created expectations which will not be satisfied. When the Government made their announcement, there was widespread expectation that much would be done for working women, but the provisions in the Bill will help only a few.

A number of other amendments are designed to deal with specific problems. Amendments Nos. 42 and 43 are intended to prevent two-tier standards of nursery care in workplace nurseries, and to prevent the possibility of only the directors of a small company benefiting from the facilities. That is a deliberate anti-abuse provision that we have suggested to the Government.

Amendment No. 17 has been tabled because we are puzzled about the age definition of a child. The Government say that it is 18. Do the Government envisage workplace nursery relief being extended to 15 and 16-year-olds? That is not what we understood from their previous statements. We want the Government to address the problem of out-of-school child care after 4 o'clock—after 3 o'clock at primary school level—and during school holidays.

Amendment No. 18 restricts tax relief to the basic rate, which seems to be a much more sensible use of the money. If the Government want to help those in the ordinary tax bracket, they should not subsidise nursery provision at the higher rate of tax, any more than they should subsidise mortgage relief at the higher rate of tax.

As part of a wider child care policy, our object is to encourage employers to give a flexible form of assistance to their employees through child care. They should take account of the different needs and requirements of their staff and do whatever is possible and appropriate for them. For many small businesses, a workplace nursery is inconceivable. For many large businesses, providing child care through another organisation would be more logical than trying to develop an in-house facility. In the public sector, it is ludicrous to assume that all nursery provision must be managed by the public sector employer. The provisions are too narrow—that is why we have tabled our amendments.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): I, too, join the hon. Members for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) in congratulating the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mrs. Heal) on her excellent speech. It proves that there was no need for the image-makers of Walworth road to gag her as they did during the by-election.

I have come hot foot from the tennis courts, having represented this House at tennis. I am pleased to say that the Lords and Commons tennis team beat Westminster school 7-2.

I am not unsympathetic to the broadening of workplace nursery provision as suggested by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman). The issue is something of a dilemma because there is a strong argument for not encouraging mothers to go out to work. There are those who argue that, while a mother has young children, her place is at home. I note that my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) agrees with that. On the other hand, there is clearly a tightening of the labour market, and the economic well-being of Britain means that we need to encourage more women to return to the job market—certainly after their children have gone to school, but even while they are still fairly young. The answer to the dilemma is to leave the decision to each and every woman——

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): What about the husbands?

Mr. Riddick: Yes, the decision is also one for the fathers. They must have a genuine choice. The argument of many of my hon. Friends is that the free market should cater for the increased demand for more women to return to work. I have no doubt that, if we left that to the free market, there would be a much greater provision of workplace nurseries—but in time. I do not argue against the use of tax relief to encourage desirable or important objectives. We have used tax relief to encourage home ownership, occupational pensions and so on. Therefore, why should not it be used to encourage women to return to work if they so wish?

I welcome the tax relief announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget speech, but if we are to introduce tax relief for workplace nursery provision, we should do it properly. The provision in the Bill is very restrictive.

A firm in my constituency, Shaws Pallets, which is based in Slaithwaite, a village in Colne valley, has drawn my attention to a problem. The company has set up a workplace nursery to cater for the children of its employees. It wishes to offer places to employees of other companies in the village. However, the tax relief to be made available through the Bill will not extend to employees of other firms. There is a case for such an extension. The Treasury is discriminating against people whose firms cannot afford to set up a workplace nursery.

I have had a letter from the Retail Consortium; no doubt other hon. Members also received a copy. Many retailers need to encourage more women to go back to work. The Retail Consortium makes the point that the Government are discriminating against small stores that cannot provide the facilities which are required, and that there is very little flexibility in the provision for tax relief.

We should not be too niggardly. There is a sound argument that there is no need for the Government to introduce the provision at all and that we should leave it to the free market. If we are to introduce tax relief, the Government should make it meaningful and ensure that the proposal works. That is why I support my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will consider the matter again and take up the proposal in the amendment tabled by my hon. Friend.

Mr. Bermingham: A short time ago the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern), who is not in his place, gave way to me; I asked him a simple question when he accused the Labour party of producing a proposal that would cost much money. He spoke in his usual accountancy terms. I never trust accountants because they can make figures tell anything they want. The hon. Gentleman forgot to say that the minute someone is allowed to exercise the economic right to go back to work, because the amount involved in child minding can be deducted as a tax expense, two more taxpayers and two more jobs have been created. The person going back to work will pay tax and the person who is being employed to mind the child will also pay tax. That figure has to be offset against tax relief.

Some years ago I read that, unless more people went to work, the gross national product would not grow. If there is a demographic profile, as there is in this country, of a reducing number of young persons entering the labour market and an increasing number of people leaving it through retirement, there will be fewer persons in the labour market. If we want to keep up the number in the labour market, thus enabling us to pay for the pensions and other benefits that we all want, we have to encourage people to go back to work. We have a massive waste of skills because married women who want to go back to work cannot afford to do so. It is no good a woman earning £50 in a part-time, shared job if it is going to cost her £40 or £60 to have her children looked after. That is lunacy.

Apart from the fact, so I understand, that women's need to go back to work is increasing, and people want to do it, they do not want to be stuck at home seven days a week with the children. My brother-in-law, who is a doctor, tells me that much of the stress and trouble within families is caused because the mother is housebound and cannot get out to work. She feels frustrated because she has so much to offer society but is denied the opportunity to do so.

The Government once again demonstrate their tunnel vision. I shall be glad when the channel tunnel is finished; we could put all the Treasury Ministers in it to show them what a real tunnel is like. They could go through it, blinkered as ever. Treasury Ministers are blinkered in their proposals in clause 20. Under the clause the employees of a big company that can provide a workplace nursery will get tax relief, but if a little company, a profession or a shop is not big enough to have its own workplace nursery, the employees will not get any tax relief. That is lunacy.

What are we doing? Once again we are saying to small businesses, "Yah-boo, tough, the Treasury does not understand your problems; you cannot compete with the big boys." We want the little businesses to prosper, but that is not the view of the Treasury. Treasury Ministers cannot see further than the end of their noses. The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) has given a classic example. The position is the same in St. Helens. The big companies such as Pilkington's will be able to provide workplace nurseries, but the little factories, particularly in the clothing trade, which desperately want machinists, cannot afford them. It takes many years to teach machinists their skills. The factories want them back, but they cannot encourage them because they cannot compete with the big boys in the provision of workplace nurseries.

If the Minister—I am sorry, I mean the Chief Secretary; I have demoted him again, but that is one of my bad habits —thought of the interests of the economy generally, he would broaden the provision to enable women to go back to work. If women could employ people to act as child minders, or if they could put their children in workplace nurseries or in nurseries provided by local authorities, the labour market would increase enormously. My hon. Friend the Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) told us about a local authority laying on a wonderful child minding scheme.

If the provision was widened, it would pay for itself in due course. There would be another spin-off benefit. As soon as tax relief is claimed, the Inland Revenue knows to whom the money has been paid. What an easy way to get rid of unauthorised child minders. The Inland Revenue would tell the local authority immediately if a person was not registered. The Inland Revenue is like that; it will snitch on anybody at any time. The Chief Secretary would do a wonderful job by getting rid of unauthorised child minders. They would pop out of the woodwork all over the place. The Chief Secretary would improve the standard of child care.

The Government have an opportunity to do something, but they will not take it. They never do. It will be the same with capital gains tax later this evening. Once again the Government cannot see beyond their tunnel vision. What a pity. They could do so much good if they listened to the voices of all hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): I hope that the House will forgive me having been absent during part of the debate. I am totally opposed to the amendments and I believe that the Government's attitude towards the problem of working mothers is wrong. When my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) proposed her ten-minute Bill recently to assist mothers of young children to go out to work, I was appalled at her apparent repudiation of traditional Conservative values with regard to the family. Therefore, I opposed her Bill. She was successful, and all I got for my pains was personal abuse from her, gratuitous insults from another lady Member of Parliament, and vitriolic attacks in the press. I also received many letters. I was, however, convinced of the support for my views by the many letters of support I received and by the guilt implicit in many of the letters which criticised me.

Fortunately, I have obtained greater wisdom from that experience because it revealed to me the true nature of the evil which lies at the root of our industrial and social policies. It also helps to explain why we British have been so unsuccessful in running our economy since the war and why we, unlike our continental competitors, have weathered the 1987 economic storm so badly. It is due to the attitude that I speak of which is inherent in my hon. Friend's amendments.

Over the past 30 years or more, under Governments of both major parties, we have become addicted to the notion that happiness lies in "doing your own thing". Never mind obligations to others, to the children we have brought into the world, to the person to whom we made our marriage vows or to elderly parents; all that matters is self-fulfilment, and the yardstick of success is material reward.

The addiction affects the whole of society, all classes of people and both sexes. Feminists in particular think of the family unit and child rearing as oppressive. Getting women into the labour force is the weapon which gains the independence they desire for their sex. They have succeeded to an extent that no one thought possible 30 years ago. We now have a continuously expanding labour force in Britain, and the expansion is provided mostly by married women. We positively encourage married women, including mothers of very young children, to go out to work. The Government have joined in the rush and the amendments tabled by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay are designed to help it along.

There are now twice as many mothers in the labour force, proportionately, in this country than there are in any of our continental competitors. Does that improve our productivity? Of course not. As we have a larger labour force, we think that we can tolerate the inefficiency and overmanning of our industries. In Europe they know better. They have far fewer married women in employment. They positively encourage the mothers of young children to stay at home with them. The average male worker in Europe is paid more and produces more than his British counterpart because their economies are based on increasing productivity and are not dissipated on a growing labour force.

For many people we have made it necessary for there to be two or more incomes coming into the household. We have disastrously tipped the fiscal balance against the traditional family. Most working mothers are forced to go out to work out of economic necessity. It is not their fault. Their husbands are not earning enough to provide for all the needs of the family. In fiscal terms we have put enormous obstacles in the way of a family which seeks to give its children the security and love derived from the presence of the mother.

We are still committing that error in the clause we are debating. Instead of the old rule which made the breadwinner responsible for the household rates, we have substituted a system which requires the mother to pay a contribution towards local public service charges even if she is not in paid employment and has no resources of her own to pay the community charge. The community charge, if it is not modified, is likely to break up more families.

There have been 30 years of progressive fiscal neglect of the family. My original objection to the proposal by my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay was expressed in inadequate terms because it was based on only half of the truth. Never mind the social consequences of a generation brought up without love or a sense of obligation to others; never mind the unhappiness caused to children by our policies. Think only of the damage that we are doing to the economy by solving our labour problems in such a way.

One of my correspondents, Mrs. Annemieke Lines, told me:

> "Redressing the fiscal balance in favour of those bearing the responsibility of bringing up the next generation will do far more to persuade young mothers to look after their children than outright condemnation for not doing so".

I accept that.

The Government have completely the wrong approach to this problem. My hon. Friend is completely off-beam in her amendments, and I hope that they will be rejected. I implore the Government to delve more deeply into the economic and social consequences of what they are doing and to cease to be pulled along by the wretched engine of feminism.

Ms. Armstrong: I am grateful for the opportunity to speak in this debate, not least because I speak shortly after my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mrs. Heal), who made a measured but powerful speech. I hope that some hon. Members who criticised her as a candidate will take note of the content of her speech and her performance, and will recognise that we all say things in by-elections and at election time that we regret later. I hope that some hon. Members regret some of the things that they said during the Mid-Staffordshire by-election.

The hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) has just spoken and I follow him with a sense of great sadness. He seems to have no understanding of the power of relationships in which people who both work are capable of loving their children. To listen to him one would think that it was impossible for fathers to take any part in their children's upbringing, care and nourishment because they go out to work.

Both my parents worked and contributed to society, but they brought me up never to put myself first and always to think of my responsibilities in the public domain. They did that while they worked, and I know that I am not alone in the House or in the country in having benefited from parents who were able to give to other people and therefore had more to give to the family. I am sad that the hon. Gentleman does not understand the contribution that working parents are able to make to the family.

The dilemma expressed by the hon. Member for Orpington has also hit the Government because in so many of their words and actions over the past year they have demonstrated that they cannot come to terms with the fact that work and the family go together. The Government need to sort out their policies to support that ideal rather than causing contradictory problems. It is significant that this is the only Government-inspired debate in which we have the opportunity to talk about child care. That demonstrates the narrowness and the poverty of the Government's understanding of issues which face us today.

If the Government had a coherent strategy on child care, or accepted the need for one, the abolition of the workplace nursery tax would be but a marginal part of their policy. I do not know where the hon. Member for Orpington got his figures on the number of married women in Europe who go out to work. They certainly do not match up with any figures for European Community countries. The EC report on child care shows that we lag behind in our provisions for children and for parents who wish to work.

Mr. Stanbrook: Can the hon. Lady deny that fewer married women go out to work in Europe than in Britain? The Government make play of the fact that our labour force is increasing all the time, all because of the increased employment of married women.

Ms. Armstrong: In France, Germany, Italy and Spain that is not the case, but the hon. Gentleman may have figures which confound those from the EC. Britain comes near the bottom of the league when it comes to mothers with young children who are able to work. We have more women out of the work force for longer than most of our European competitors, and when they do return they do so at a lower level both in terms of status and pay. The main reason that is given for that is lack of adequate child care. During that time we are wasting the money that we have invested in their training, their experience and the commitment that they wish to make. It is for those reasons, if for no other, that we need more adequate child care facilities.

Mr. Humfrey Malins (Croydon, North-West): Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Armstrong: No. The hon. Gentleman has only just come into the Chamber and we have been debating the matter for the past three hours.

The Government are prepared to tackle child care only with this minimal measure and, while that continues to be the case, we shall not be able to give our children the sort of start that they need. I hope that the hon. Member for Orpington will recognise that throughout the continent children have better opportunities than they have here. I was in Barcelona last weekend at the European child care network conference and few there were struggling in the way that the British delegation was with inadequate, patchy, mixed and poorly regulated provisions.

Mr. Malins: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Ms. Armstrong: No.

It is clear that other members of the Government have had different views of the tax. The right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler), speaking on the imposition of the workplace nursery tax after his resignation, said:

"It is an eccentric policy and indeed up to April 1984 it was not policy at all. For almost 40 years the positon had been that no one had paid tax on the benefit from a workplace nursery. The policy was then changed on the view that tax had always been payable but had simply not been collected. We are now left in the extraordinary position that a motorist who has free parking at his place of work in central London does not pay tax on this undoubted benefit, while a mother who makes use of a workplace nursery does. It is time that this curious policy was taken away and put out of its misery."

I agree with the right hon. Gentleman, but he did not make his views known when he was a member of the Cabinet.

The Government's proposal is narrow. It is a small gesture which is an inadequate response to our needs or demands. However, I counsel and caution those who argue that tax relief should be the main way in which we extend our child care provisions. The experience of most countries is that that means has dismally failed. It has not served as a lever to increase the numberof places nor to maintain quality.

The Opposition are determined to increase opportunities for child care but we shall ensure that they are of the highest quality. There is no point in opening up the provision of child care of a dubious quality only to have to deal with the problems that that creates later. We have to make sure that it is of the highest quality, and that is why the Opposition have argued for a partnership among the public, voluntary and private sectors.

Employers have a responsibility to contribute to child care provision, but it is the responsibility of all society to ensure that it is of the highest quality. I commend to the House those local authorities who, despite the Government, have been trying hard to ensure that they can develop such partnerships. I shall be attending the launch of such a partnership in north Tyneside on Monday. There the local authority, despite being capped by the Government, is trying its hardest to meet the needs of the economy and of children.

If the Government are serious about the changes in the Bill, I urge them to look much further. Some of the Opposition's amendments give a lead in terms of fiscal policy, but none of my hon. Friends would pretend that fiscal policy can sort out the problems. We now have the opportunity to create a completely new relationship between work and the family in which women have the right to work, to train and to gain experience.

If we develop a proper work and family policy, we shall develop opportunities for fathers to be much more crucially involved in child care and to play their part in it. That is what people are looking for. It is a popular policy wherever I go. I urge the Minister to talk to his colleagues in the Cabinet and to ensure that we have a comprehensive child care policy which will address the needs of children and of men and women who happen to be parents.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: I shall not detain the House for more than five minutes because many of the points that I wanted to make have already been made. But it would be remiss of me not to start by congratulating the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mrs. Heal) on her maiden speech. I too had the pleasure, along with many of my colleagues, of visiting her constituency recently. Her eloquent and elegant comments, particularly about the role and the position of the disabled in society, were well made and I hope that we shall hear more from her on that subject in future.

When one strips away the political hoo-hah, there is a wide measure of agreement on the Back Benches on both sides of the House about the direction in which the Government should move in future. It is a pity that the Government have not been given more credit for introducing tax relief for workplace nurseries. It is a major step forward, which I welcome. It is right to make it clear at the start that the Government deserve credit for that.

I declare what must at least be described as a tangential interest as the husband of a highly qualified member of the medical profession. That experience leads me to believe that while I agree with much of what has been said by almost every hon. Member who has spoken, I find little to agree with in the speech made by my hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook).

I, along with most of my hon. Friends, incline to the view that we should have what has come to be known since the early 1980s as a level playing field with regard to the spending of taxpayers' money and should try to strip out as many tax reliefs as possible. But let us be frank. We recognise that in some cases such as mortgage tax relief there is a political imperative and in others, such as with pensions, there is an economic and political imperative, which encourage us to produce such a tax distortion. That is the argument that the Treasury accepted when it introduced tax relief for workplace nurseries. I welcome that, but we should accept that whether or not it is a good thing to have such tax reliefs is a pass which has now been sold. The Treasury—and I agree—has expressed the view and put it into legislation that we should have them. There are personal, economic and political gains to be had from that.

There is the possibility of a tremendous economic gain. In the part of the country that I represent, we are facing a 40 per cent. reduction in the number of school leavers. We desperately need to encourage women back into the workplace. Frequently, people come to my surgeries and tell me how much they pay for child care, and what they earn from a part-time or even a full-time job; often the difference is very narrow. This is an important measure, and I hope that the Treasury keeps its effect under review in the light of what will happen this year.

The knitwear industry, which is a major industry in the part of the world that I represent, will benefit significantly from the Bill. There is also the question of personal gain. Conservatives believe in extending choice and opportunity, and the Bill will do that. Many women do not want to go out to work, but prefer to stay at home and look after the children; others are better mothers because they go out to work. There are no black-and-white rules.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Mitchell: No; my time is very limited.

Having made those points of principle, I shall now deal briefly with some specific points. I hope that Treasury Ministers will consider whether the Bill may prove too restrictive. There is some discrimination—as my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) pointed out—against small businesses and smaller employers, who will not have the time or the wherewithal to support the necessary operations that are enshrined in the Bill. It is important for us to keep under review whether its reach is sufficient.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) referred to premises being made available by employers, and a number of amendments address that point. A firm's staff may be spread around a city, and it is impractical to expect staff to bring their children to a central workplace nursery: they will not do it. I agree with the suggestion that employers should be allowed to buy space in creches or nurseries established by third parties, and I endorse what my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay said about a voucher system. We should consider the possibility of employers paying a third party direct. Creche facilities and child minding services are often provided in accommodation that may have been converted or adapted, but is still primarily occupied for domestic use. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary will bear it in mind that the need for specialist creche or nursery facilities as opposed to domestic accommodation is not an easy case to pursue.

In the Bill, care is defined to exclude

"supervised activity provided primarily for education purposes".

While I do not advocate a system that allows private education to be provided in the guise of child care, surely we should not prohibit the provision of pre-school education as part of those child care facilities. The line between supervised activity—as defined in the Bill—and education is difficult to draw in practice. Children may be taught to read and write at nursery; will that be disqualified by the Bill? I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider that point—if not today, perhaps in the future.

The clause is a major step forward. It is a pity that Opposition Front Benchers did not give the Government more credit for listening to what many hon. Members have said. I hope that my right hon. Friend will keep the operation of the clause under review, and consider whether next year we need to go further.

Mr. Norman Lamont: This has been a lively debate. It could hardly have been otherwise, with contributions from my hon. Friend the Member for Billericay (Mrs. Gorman) and from the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng). We all understand why the hon. Member for Brent, South has had to leave the Chamber repeatedly during this debate; we regret that, and sympathise with him and with his constituents.

Let me join other hon. Members in congratulating the hon. Member for Mid-Staffordshire (Mrs. Heal). Everyone who heard her maiden speech will agree that it was outstanding. It was not only confident, eloquent and authoritative but extremely knowledgable, and it demonstrated that the disabled and mentally ill have recruited a powerful ally. All Conservative Members also appreciated her generous tribute to John Heddle.

The hon. Member for Brent, South made a robust attack on the Government. Although it was an attack, he was right to identify many conflicting considerations and genuine dilemmas. I shall explain the Government's philosophy and approach, which—as the hon. Gentleman rightly said—is different from the approach that we adopted in last year's Finance Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) was right to say that we must bear in mind not only the Bill's social consequences but the consequences of our taxation policy. It is the Government's philosophy—and their repeated intention—to broaden the tax base, and whenever possible to limit the use of special reliefs. It is true that we have made special exemptions where we considered that appropriate. However, on the whole the cost of those reliefs has been modest. In general, our aim has been greater neutrality and a broader tax base, with lower rates and limited reliefs. Some of the proposals made in the debate would involve large amounts of money—perhaps not as an immediate consequence of the amendments, but they would be likely to move the boundaries of relief further away.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern) accurately summed up the purpose of the Budget changes. The hon. Member for Brent, South frequently used the word "largesse". I am not sure that Conservative Members have used it in relation to the amendment. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West rightly stressed that the clause was not intended as a step towards a general child care allowance. We have never claimed that. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) repeated his request for a general child allowance, extending to child care in the home, but I do not agree with that in principle, and it would also be extremely expensive. It was never our intention, and it is not what the changes were designed to achieve.

Familiar points about tax policy were implicit in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling. We do not want employers to be able to formulate tax-efficient remuneration packages; by and large, we want people to be remunerated in cash. We want fewer benefits in kind. That has been the idea behind many of our changes—for instance, the taxation of company cars.

My hon. Friend the Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) made his views clear, as he has done before. The Government's view is that the tax system should be neutral: it should be left to individuals to decide whether they wish to work or to stay at home with their children. I do not think that that neutrality is substantially compromised by this limited change. My hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West emphasised that the change is limited.

The hon. Member for Brent, South asked why we were making the change. There are several reasons. First, it was put to us repeatedly that employers found it troublesome to continue assessing and reporting to the Inland Revenue the value of day nurseries. Secondly, it was argued that the burden on industry was an effective deterrent to the development of workplace nurseries. It was also argued repeatedly in the House that there was some resentment about the tax treatment of workplace nurseries. We have made a limited change, putting the tax treatment of workplace nurseries very much in line with that of other benefits in kind. For example, there is a tax exemption for workplace canteens that are provided on the premises. The treatment of workplace nurseries is broadly analogous to those limited concessions.

In the Budget and in the Bill we have done exactly what the Labour party asked us to do when we debated the Finance Bill last year. Benefits in kind are extremely complicated and it is difficult to draw boundaries. There are only two ways of achieving a policy that does not create anomalies. One is to have no relief whatsoever, and the other is to go to the extreme proposed by the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed and have relief for all the costs of child care, including child care at home. That would be enormously expensive and would carry a heavy dead weight cost.

Mr. Beith: I should like to get the definition right. I referred not to all the costs but to the costs incurred in all kinds of child care.

Mr. Lamont: I accept the correction, but the costs would still be huge, and would carry a large element of dead weight.

The hon. Member for Brent, South pointed out the irony that last year I resisted precisely what we have done in this year's Budget. I have had it quoted back to me that I said that if we moved a small way we would create a great deal of pressure for much more relief. Looking at the 20 amendments that have been tabled, I realise that all the arguents I used last year were not exactly lacking in force. None the less, it is right that we are making a small, limited change and it is equally right that it should be ring-fenced.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed referred to amendment No. 41, which proposes that any contribution by an employee to the cost of a nursery place provided for by an employer shall be deductible for tax purposes. It would be difficult to concede that principle in addition to the concession that we have already made that it would not be assessable to tax as a benefit. It would create a clear unfairness against those who were paying their own child care costs and did not have the benefit of a workplace nursery. To do that on top of the concession we have already made would exacerbate that unfairness.

Mr. Raison: My right hon. Friend has been making an extremely good speech directed against his own proposals. He has argued the case against tax relief on benefits in kind; he has argued that as a matter of general policy we should not be looking for more tax relief, especially when they give particular benefit to those who are better off. He also said that he sought equal treatment. How can one possibly say that there is equal treatment if one provides tax relief to those who are earning money yet provides nothing for those families in which the mother stays at home to look after her children? It appears to me to be a fundamentally unequal proposition.

Mr. Lamont: As I have tried to explain, we have made an extremely limited concession at a cost of some £10 million. It is precisely analogous to the way in which we treat certain other benefits in kind and communal facilities such as sports facilities and canteens which are provided on the employer's premises. Only in those circumstances are they exempt from tax. That is already built in to our policy on the taxation of benefits in kind. I do not think that what we have done is markedly out of line with the treatment of other benefits. That is why we can make a limited move in that direction.

The hon. Member for Brent, South also talked about amendments Nos. 8 and 9. The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed and my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) were concerned about small companies. Under the Bill it is possible for people to share in the provision of nurseries. They have to share in the financing and the management of them. We shall see whether we can clarify that in some document, but it is not intended that the management responsibility should be onerous. It would be quite sufficient for the company to monitor the performance of the nursery and to be represented on the management committee; it does not mean it would have to be involved in its day-to-day management, nor does finance have to be provided in equal proportions between the partners. It will be possible for firms to collaborate.

In the interests of saving time, perhaps I could write to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed. I can assure him that the anxieties he expressed about companies getting together and about the BBC participating in a facility in this building are not well grounded, but I shall write to him and explain why. I shall also write to my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley. It will be possible for companies to operate as a group and for small companies to participate in such schemes.

My hon. Friend the Member for Billericay spoke to amendments Nos. 25, 26 and 27 with her customary verve and exuberance, and we all very much enjoyed listening to her. Amendment No. 25 seeks to insert a new provision into the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988 so that child care provided for an employee, including vouchers, cash allowances and reimbursement of expenses, would be exempt from taxation as a benefit in kind. I was rebuked by my right hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Raison), but that really would drive a coach and horses through the tax system. We do not give people relief for vouchers except to a de minimis amount for meals or for travel. There is no limit to the number of things for which people might claim the reimbursement of expenses or a voucher for the purchase of a benefit. They might claim that any important purchase should be exempt from tax. Apart from the objection made by my hon. Friend the Member for Bristol, North-West, that would be difficult to police.

My hon. Friend's amendment shifts the relief much more in the direction of a general child care allowance. It would be much more difficult to defend the new boundary line if employers were allowed to remunerate bought in nursery care and it would be easy to ask why employers should not fund child minders. It would be extremely difficult to draw that distinction.

I am well aware that my hon. Friend wants there to be a general child care allowance, so perhaps she will forgive me if I am a little suspicious of why she proposes pushing the boundary only so far, leaving me a little anxious that it will be difficult to resist her next campaign. That applies equally to amendment No. 27.

In amendment No. 26, my hon. Friend comes a little way towards meeting us because she proposes the conditions that child care should not be provided at the residence of the child. But in doing that she is in slight danger of creating another anomaly, because employer funding of a nanny at a person's home would be excluded, but if a child was left at a child minder's home elsewhere that would be covered. That would be a very difficult boundary to defend. The cost of what my hon. Friend and other hon. Members have been proposing might be relatively small in the first few years, but it would gradually build up and, if it became more like a child care allowance, it would involve a significant sum of money. A general child care allowance would certainly cost hundreds of millions of pounds.

The amendments underline the fact that there is no logical stopping point in the debate; it is extremely difficult to draw the line. We have made a modest, limited amendment. I have tried to explain the reasons for making it, and I believe that it will make life a little easier for some employers. There is little tax revenue at stake. The amendment that we have made accords with the general policy on the taxation of benefits in kind. It is a limited change, and it will do a modest amount of good. In that spirit, I commend the clause to the House and urge it to reject the amendments.

Mr. Boateng: I thank the Chief Secretary and hon. Members for their forbearance when I had to leave the Chamber. There has been a deplorable, murderous attack on a soft target in Wembley surrounded by civilians' homes and people going about their ordinary business. That attack was futile and mindless, and those who perpetrate such attacks will not succeed in their objectives. On behalf not only of my constituents but of the whole House, I thank the police and ambulance services for their sterling work in dealing with the deceased and injured.

The debate has demonstrated the almost schizophrenic nature of the Conservative party on this issue. We heard from that tendency within the Conservative party which is geared to the philosophy of kinder, küche, kirche. They are concerned that women should remain with their children by the hearth and in the church. They see no role for them in the wider world. That philosophy is epitomised by the hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook), and it is alive, well and flourishing in the Conservative party.

There is the hard-line tendency, ably demonstrated by the Chief Secretary, who was almost dragged to the Dispatch Box to make the concession announced by the Chancellor, presumably against the Chief Secretary's best advice, in the Budget. That is why the Chancellor talked of a small measure and said:

> "We have always made it clear that it is not for the Government to encourage or discourage women with children to go out to work. That is rightly a decision for them to take, and one in which the Government would be wise not to interfere."—[Official Report, 20 March 1990; Vol. 169, c.1020.]

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): Hear, hear.

Mr. Boateng: I hear the Financial Secretary say, "Hear hear." The erstwhile Secretary of State for Employment, before he returned to the bosom of his family, declared the 1990s to be the decade of the working woman.

Conservative Members must decide which of those tendencies they will adhere to—the recidivist, atavistic tendency of the hon. Member for Orpington, the monetarist tendency, which is in its last gasps, of the Chief Secretary or the more benign tendency of the former Employment Secretary, whose banner was well taken up by the hon. Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell), and who deserves a word of praise. He erred—the Chief Secretary will know this—in expecting Labour Members to say "thank you" for this measure, because in 1984, where this aberration has its origins, the Conservative party agreed that it was better to put those who seek to obtain a company car in a preferential position compared with those who seek to obtain and use a workplace nursery. Conservative Members—and the Chief Secretary encouraged them—were responsible for elevating a Porsche above Petula and Patrick. That is the reality—the Porsche comes first, and let Petula and Patrick's parents take care of them.

The Government have changed a bit, but they have not changed enough. That is why we intend to press amendment No. 9, which deals with our most modest request—that employees, particularly those employed by small companies, have the option to attend community nurseries, voluntary nurseries or local authority nurseries if that is what they decide. That is in accordance with the reality of the demand and the spirit of the Bill.

Mr. Riddick: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

7.15 pm

Mr. Boateng: No, I am afraid that time is too short.

I must take to task the hon. Member for Bristol, North-West (Mr. Stern), who suggested that amendment No. 41 is profligate. "How much would it cost?" came the cry, as though we were about to take billions from the Treasury. If the hon. Gentleman looks in a little more detail at amendment No. 41—I know that he will give it his attention, if not now, in due course—he will find that it is strictly limited to workplace nurseries, bearing in mind the strictures of the Chief Secretary. Any contribution made by the employee will become taxable in the employer's hands. The employer may pay tax at 35 per cent. while the employee pays tax at 25 per cent. in these circumstances, there is a net gain to the Treasury. What could be more prudent, more moderate or more in tune with the correct degree of fiscal rectitude than that? It is indeed a modest amendment.

If there were any justice or any truth in Conservative Members' approach to these matters, they would accept amendment No. 41. If they cannot do so, we say that they should accept amendment No. 9. Let them do something for the kids, something for employers who are seeking to expand the pool of skilled labour on which they might usefully draw, and something for the working women and parents of this country, because—let us make no bones about it—the Government may do nothing now but we shall do something soon and we shall do a great deal.

The Chairman of Ways and Means (Mr. Harold Walker): Do I understand that the hon. Gentleman will seek to divide the House on amendment No. 9 and that he will therefore seek to withdraw amendment No. 41?

Mr. Boateng: Yes. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment proposed: No. 9, in page 11, line 27, leave out from 'persons' to end of line 30.—[Mr. Boateng.]

Clause 20 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Boateng: On a point of order, Mr. Walker. Hon. Members will be aware that late this afternoon there occurred in Wembley, in my constituency, a cowardly and murderous attack on an army installation in a quiet suburban street. One person was killed and at least eight were seriously injured. Wembley town centre was shaken by the blast.

As this is the second such attack in London in a very short period, there would clearly seem to be a pattern to these events and it appears to be the start of a major terrorist campaign. In view of that, would it not be in order for a member of Her Majesty's Government to come to the House and make a statement about the steps that are to be taken to counter that campaign?

Clearly, difficulties are always involved in such incidents. Those responsible for these murderous attacks are likely to strike at random. They have no care for the civilian population and do not mind the hardship, suffering and agony that they cause to communities. They are beneath contempt. But some action has to be taken to alert the civilian population and such installations to the danger that exists. We must step up our vigilance and our support for the police and emergency services, which must have the resources at their disposal to deal with this menace, and have them now. I hope that a Minister will come to the Despatch Box and make just such a statement because one is urgently needed.

The Minister of State for Defence Procurement (Mr. Alan Clark): Further to that point of order, Mr. Walker. I express my appreciation of the exceedingly wise and temperate manner in which the hon. Member for Brent, South (Mr. Boateng) made his points. As for a statement by one of my hon. Friends or myself, that matter is under urgent and immediate consideration.

Clause 23

TAX-EXEMPT SPECIAL SAVINGS ACCOUNTS

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): I beg to move amendment No. 31, in page 14, line 26, after 'society', insert

'or an industrial and provident society'.

7.45 pm

The Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take amendment No. 32, in page 14, line 26, after 'society', insert

'or an industrial and provident society covered by a loan deposit protection scheme approved by Her Majesty's Treasury'.

Mr. McFall: I am speaking on behalf of the co-operative movement, which has been largely ignored by the Government in the Bill. We welcome the inclusion of building societies in the TESSA—tax-exempt special savings account—scheme because they are part of the mutual sector. Co-operative societies have a long tradition of being savings institutions in addition to their role as retailers. We should welcome the inclusion of co-operatives within the scheme.

Since 1844, co-ops have encouraged their members to follow a policy of self-help and thrift, in line with the present Government's view on wider share ownership. The co-operative movement was built on the policy of savings. The surpluses arising on trading were allocated to members pro rata to their trading with the co-operatives. Those amounts were credited to the members' share accounts and formed the working capital of the co-ops, on which a limited rate of interest was payable.

The membership of co-ops in the United Kingdom today is about 8 million and the retail turnover is slightly less than £6 billion. That shows that it is still a fine example of self-help and a force in the retail market.

Up to 1984 it was accepted that co-ops were different from other organisations because they were liable to corporation tax at a special 40 per cent. rate, when other companies paid 52 per cent. on taxable profits. It was then decided to make changes in the structure of taxation: relief was withdrawn for the increases in trading stock, and first-year allowances and the special rates for co-ops were withdrawn. To compensate for those withdrawals, the rate of corporation tax was reduced to 35 per cent. The co-operative movement and I felt that that change benefited companies more than co-operatives.

Along with those changes, tax incentives were introduced to assist various categories of taxpayer, for example the business expansion scheme, profit sharing and personal equity plans. In all those cases, co-ops could not take advantage of any of the tax incentives. All those factors have disadvantaged co-ops in relation to their competitors. Therefore, if the proposed TESSA savings scheme is introduced, and co-ops are once again excluded, there is a considerable danger that that will result in money being withdrawn from co-operatives and invested in TESSAs with banks and building societies. That would undoubtedly place co-ops in considerable difficulties.

Therefore, we request that co-ops should have the same opportunities to participate in the operation of the new TESSAs as banks and building societies. We emphasise that we are asking not for special treatment but merely for parity of treatment with those concerns, which we see as competitors in obtaining capital.

Amendments Nos. 31 and 32 are intended as alternatives. The first would bring all industrial and provident societies, including co-operatives and friendly societies, into the net. If the Government feel that that is too wide, the second amendment would bring in societies whose depositors are already protected under a scheme drawn up under the Banking Act 1987. Those schemes give our savers protection comparable with that enjoyed by depositors with banks and building societies.

We believe that either amendment would assist the Chancellor's objective of encouraging savings, because they would widen the social range of people taking advantage of the new concessions on TESSAs. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Lilley: One of the key features of TESSA is that we have taken great care to keep the rules and regulations and general red tape to an absolute minimum. We can do that for a scheme that is confined to banks and building societies because for each of those types of institution there is already a proper statutory framework in the Banking Act 1987 or Building Societies Act 1986 providing for authorisation, regulation and investor protection, so we did not need to add that to clause 23.

Once we tried, however, to go wider than the two main groups of deposit takers, it would be necessary to complicate the Finance Bill provisions to take account of the different circumstances of the bodies concerned. I should be very reluctant to do that, and in the absence of a proper regulatory framework, the Inland Revenue would need to get more involved in checking that institutions were operating the new TESSA scheme properly.

The two amendments would appear to bring in all industrial and provident societies, many of which do not typically take deposits at all. It is true that it would be theoretically possible to limit the scope of the clause to co-ops, which I imagine is the intention of the hon. Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall).

It is true that co-ops have historically undertaken small-scale deposit taking. The hon. Members who sponsored the amendments were obviously well aware of that, and I recognise that the co-ops' depositors are covered by an investor protection scheme, as the hon. Gentleman mentioned. But the point is that co-ops benefit from total exemption from the Banking Act and are not subject to the detailed authorisation or prudential supervision applied to banks and building societies. I do not therefore think it appropriate that they should be allowed to offer TESSAs.

Moreover, co-ops' exemptions under the Banking Act exist largely because their deposit taking is on a small scale and incidental to their main trading activity. If societies wanted to expand their deposit-taking activities significantly or to enter the mainstream of retail banking with products such as TESSAs, those exemptions would no longer be appropriate.

Co-ops also have a certain tax advantage; they can pay interest gross on their deposits to taxpayers and non-taxpayers alike. So they do not get a bad deal overall under the present arrangements.

The co-operative movement is not excluded from TESSA altogether, since I understand that the Co-op bank is authorised under the Banking Act. I must advise the House not to accept the amendments, which go further than is necessary or desirable and which complicate unduly what is now a very simple scheme.

[Mr. Lilley]

Mr. McFall: The Minister correctly said that the Co-op bank is included, but there are many other aspects to the co-operative movement and it was to highlight them that I moved the amendment. I have no intention of pressing it to a Division but I should like the Minister to consider incorporating co-ops in future. As I said earlier, we have a membership of 8 million and a turnover of £6 billion, a not inconsiderable element in the economy. Perhaps if the Minister cannot give me an answer today, he will do so at some time in the future.

Mr. Lilley: I shall certainly do that, and I welcome the co-operative spirit in which the hon. Gentleman moved the amendment. We recognise the valuable contribution that the co-operative movement makes, both to its members and to the economy, and I shall look into the matter in that spirit.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): I have not previously attended the debates on the Finance Bill, but the Minister's agreement to consider what my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton (Mr. McFall) has proposed was helpful. I look forward to the outcome of his consideration.

To help the Minister's consideration, may I say a word or two as the former chairman of a co-operative society, the former chairman of the Scottish co-operative wages board and salaries committee and as a member of the national wages board? In my younger days I was deeply involved in the co-operative movement, so I am well aware of the integral part that that movement has played in various localities, especially in the industrial areas of Great Britain.

It is certainly true, as my hon. Friend would concede, that much of the co-operative movement has disappeared from industrial Britain for the very reasons that my hon. Friend adduced—the co-operative movement, through no fault of Governments, has gradually been placed at a disadvantage vis-a-vis its competitors. If the movement were placed at an even greater disadvantage, that could be serious.

The problem is that the capital that shareholders invest in the movement is not in shares in the sense in which they are quoted on the stock exchange; nor are they shares in the sense that they must be sold to someone else before a person can redeem his investment. This is a banking system from which people can withdraw share capital at seven days' notice. When more attractive avenues for savings open up, there can be a run on share capital, and co-operative societies throughout the country face severe difficulties when such runs occur because they can have a grave impact on a society's trading position.

I am glad that my hon. Friend the Member for Dumbarton has taken this opportunity to speak about his amendments, and he is right not to push them to the vote. He has given the House a chance to hear about the continuing importance of the co-operative movement in many places throughout the country. Indeed, I notice that co-operative organisations are springing up again in deprived areas where groups are getting together to form them. In many ways that takes us back to the days of the Rochdale pioneers and even to the founder of the co-operative movement himself—Owen. History has come full circle, so I am glad that the Minister is keeping an open mind. I hope that he will consider the amendments as seriously as he spoke about them.

Amendment negatived.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): This was a Budget of small measures, and TESSAs are another small measure. One of the Government's claimed highlights in an otherwise lacklustre Bill is the introduction of the tax-exempt special savings accounts, now running under the acronym TESSAs. They constitute the Government's attempt to make savings more attractive.

This seems to me a backhanded attempt to acknowledge that a great economic error was made in the 1988 Budget—the tax cuts of the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), which were much heralded at the time but which have since been shown to have fuelled a massive increase in consumer spending and to have generated a spending boom. By handing out deep tax cuts, the Government merely fuelled a massive trade deficit.

The tax-cutting Budget of 1988 also resulted in a massive redistribution of wealth from the poorest to the richest. In the 11 years during which the Government have been in office, £6·7 billion has been taken from the bottom 50 per cent. of the population and £5·6 billion of that has gone to the richest 10 per cent. Of that sum, £4·8 billion has gone to the top 5 per cent.

We encourage savings, but we are entitled to ask whether that will encourage real savings or whether it will be another tax break for those who already have savings. TESSAs were welcomed by the Secretary of State for Wales and there was a tribute to that welcome in The Times on 21 March:

"A wry smile flashed across the relaxed face of Peter Walker, out-going Secretary of State for Wales, when John Major disclosed details of the new Tax-Exempt Special Savings Account—which he promptly abbreviated to 'Tessa'. For that is the name of Walker's wife. After the speech Walker admitted he had indeed been smiling for that reason. 'I was at the Cabinet meeting this morning when John Major told us the news and I told him that I was very grateful that, for my last Budget, there was something in it dedicated to my wife'".

Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman and his wife are thinking of taking up a TESSA. They are in a good position to do so because TESSAs will not reach down to the small savers but will be geared to people in the middle and higher income brackets.

TESSAs were welcomed with caution by the City. There was not an immediate response, nor the view that they would result in an increase in savings throughout the population. A recent report from the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service said:

"We would not necessarily expect to see a very sharp increase in aggregate in savings in the short term as a result of the Budget measures."

A Mr. Olivier, of Hambros unit trusts business, was reported in the Financial Times as saying:

"TESSAs are more likely to reshuffle old money about."

If that is the case there may well be no real encouragement for new savings.

The key question is, who will be expected to save in the current economic climate? The Bill gives some tax concessions to companies and to the City but does nothing to help the poorest to meet higher costs in rents, mortgages and the poll tax. It does nothing for 7 million people on low pay. The Treasury figures show that, although 85 per cent. of couples who earn more than £35,000 a year will benefit, only 25 per cent. of those who earn between £5,000 and £10,000 will gain from the Budget.

The number of people caught in the poverty trap of taxes and means-tested benefits is estimated to increase to 410,000, compared with 290,000 in November 1985. Since the poll tax was introduced at the beginning of last month, a family on half average earnings will be about £1·80 a week worse off as a result of the Bill. That also results from the holding back of an increase in child benefit and the introduction of the poll tax. Many families will pay an extra 91p a week in spending taxes.

Let us look at those who would not benefit from taking up a TESSA because they have no liability to tax anyway. They include people on benefit or income support, the unemployed, pensioners without substantial occupational pensions, and single people earning less than £6,500 who are unlikely to have much spare cash to move into TESSAs. Couples earning less than £13,000 are also unlikely to have much spare cash to spend on them.

In the case of married couples where the wife does not work and there is not much in the way of savings, the interest income is already covered by the wife's tax allowance, so TESSAs will not benefit such couples. The same applies to couples where the wife is earning less than £3,000 and there are no large savings. Anyone with a mortgage of more than £30,000 is unlikely to take up a TESSA because it would be better for him to pay off his mortgage.

The categories of people that I have mentioned make up the bulk of my constituents, and I am sure that they fit the constituents of many other hon. Members. The average wage is £269·50 a week, but on the whole people in my constituency do not earn as much as that. Although west Yorkshire is a low-wage area, it is at the top of the savings league; the people there save 14·8 per cent. of their income. They are good savers, although they have very low incomes, but TESSAs will not help them. The real beneficiaries will be married couples who already have investment income of £3,300 or more on current interest rates and who have at least £25,000 in the bank or about £60,000 in shares. Couples where the wife earns over £3,300 but who do not have a mortgage of more than £30,000 will also benefit, as will single people earning more than £6,500.

There are two essential requirements for a TESSA to be of any advantage to a family. The first is that that family has the resources to be able to put money into a TESSA. The second is that there would otherwise have been a tax liability on the interest receivable. If the first requirement is not satisfied, in practice it is not possible to use a TESSA at all or no tax advantage can be obtained. If the second requirement is not satisfied, a TESSA can be operated, but it obviously offers the family no tax advantage.

Before we can make a judgment about whether there are adequate resources to put money into TESSAs, we must bear in mind the requirement that the money cannot be withdrawn before the end of the five-year period. That means that only people who are able to save as a matter of course each year out of income are likely to be able to take up TESSAs.

As I have said, non-taxpayers, those on benefit and pensioners who do not have a substantial occupational pensions will not be able to benefit, nor will those whose incomes are largely taken up trying to survive by day-to-day expenditure. That category could be said to include single people earning less than £6,500, virtually all single-parent families and married couples earning less than £13,000 a year. They are all unlikely to have any disposable income for TESSAs, especially after mortgage rises are taken into account. We challenge the Government's notion that TESSAs are a great gift and an incentive to savers. It will be seen that the advantages of TESSAs are for high-income families and that that advantage will be magnified because both husband and wife can take up a TESSA.

Despite the Government's warnings about the inflationary wage spiral, top company directors continue to award themselves rises far in excess of inflation. Recent increases in directors' salaries have been as high as 171 per cent., and average rises are 40 per cent. I am not talking just about boardroom directors. A recent feature in the Financial Times showed that Britain's business managers —those earning between £30,000 and £200,000 a year—are on schedule for pay increases of between 12 and 14 per cent. Perhaps it is to precisely such people that TESSAs are directed. It would have been better not to directly redistribute income to them in the first place in the tax-cutting Budget of 1988.

It remains to be seen whether TESSAs will result in a new build-up of savings rather than switches from other accounts or perhaps from shares. Will they attract people who would have saved in the medium term anyway? It could be argued that, at a time of a high interest rates, no one with a mortgage is likely to save money on a regular and long-term basis when it could be used to repay that mortgage. Have the Government considered that argument?

One could push the logic of the argument and say that TESSAs will encourage borrowing. If the Government have not considered it they might like to take account of the way that TESSAs will impact on working out repayments of mortgage interest. In practice, they may have the opposite effect to encouraging savings.

This is a small measure, and we believe that TESSAs will have a marginal effect—at best, increasing the personal sector savings ratio. We question the usefulness of a scheme which, in the current economic climate, merely rewards existing savers for their existing savings. There is no evidence that TESSAs will encourage those on low incomes to save. A much better alternative to TESSAs would be positive public support for bodies such as credit unions, which provide community-based means of encouraging even those on the lowest incomes to save and share. Even such bodies found favour and encouragement in The Economist on 31 March. I shall be pressing my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) to do all that he can for credit unions when he is appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer, as he will be soon.

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) described TESSA as a tiny measure. I think that it is an important measure both for what it achieves and for the signals that it generates in the economy as a whole. It is one of the most imaginative features of the Budget. He suggested that the name "tax-exempt special savings account" was a deliberate attempt to ingratiate ourselves with my right hon. Friend the Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker). There may be some truth in that, but, if so, it was because I could not find a name for the scheme that would result in the acronym NORMA and that meant the same thing.

This is a straightforward and simple instrument. It took a lot of paring down to make it as simple as it is. We have deliberately kept the rules and restrictions to a bare minimum. That is desirable in any case, but it is especially important if the scheme is to attract ordinary taxpayers. We do not want a scheme which appeals only to sophisticated financial whiz kids. TESSA is for all taxpayers. I am pleased to note that it has been welcomed from both sides of the House and outside.

Contrary to what the hon. Member for Leeds, West said, TESSA is aimed at the ordinary person and, because of that, we based the scheme on the most simple and straightforward form of saving—putting money into a high street bank or building society. We are not saying that this form of saving is better than any other. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor took the opportunity in the Budget to encourage other forms of saving, including significant increases in the amount that could be saved in personal equity plans. I hope that many of those who are encouraged to begin saving in a TESSA will go on to discover the attractions of share ownership. If we are to influence people's decisions at the margins between saving and spending, rather than just affecting the choice between different ways of saving, it is absolutely right to target the most simple and familiar form of saving.

TESSAs can be started from 1 January 1991. Already there are signs that the major banks and building societies will offer TESSAs. We are delighted that they are putting their marketing efforts behind this form of savings. In some cases, institutions may offer several variants, aimed at the people in different circumstances. I welcome this because we want TESSA to reach as many people as possible. It is clear that she will be a great success.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West said that TESSAs will not benefit those in low income groups because so many of them are not paying tax. We have raised tax relief by 35 per cent. in real terms, and inevitably, if a larger chunk of income is relieved from tax, more people are paying less tax. They should not benefit twice from the absence of tax—through not paying on low incomes, and with a relief such as TESSA. That is inevitable, but it is more desirable that allowances are set at this level rather than at the level that we inherited.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West claimed that TESSA is aimed at, and will benefit, the rich. There is a £9,000 limit on the amount that can be paid into a TESSA over five years. During the Budget debate, the Leader of the Opposition said of the £16,000 limit on savings above which people could not benefit from community charge relief, that it was not "a prince's ransom". Therefore, £9,000 is even less of a prince's ransom. It is a respectable, modest amount and many people will be able to aspire to contribute that over five years.

8.15 pm

The hon. Member for Leeds, West quoted a City document which said that TESSA would simply result in the reshuffling of old money. All money is either in bank notes—in the minority of cases—or in bank and building society deposits. TESSA will encourage people to shift from highly liquid deposits to deposits for which there is a growing incentive not to spend. There is a distinction between having money in a deposit that is spent frequently and therefore circulates freely about the economy and having money in a deposit that is saved. The latter is the one that we are trying to encourage. Once people have put their money into a TESSA, they will have put it into something like a mousetrap. They will lose nothing by doing so, but should they then spend the money they will have to forgo the tax relief that has built up in the TESSA. There may be a reluctance to withdraw money from a TESSA, but there is not to withdraw from ordinary deposit accounts. That is an incentive to save and is thoroughly desirable.

Ms. Diane Abbott (Hackney, North and Stoke Newington): I apologise for not being here for the beginning of the Minister's speech.

There is an argument over whether TESSA will involve only the reshuffling of money, or, as Conservative Members imply, result in an increase in the overall volume of saving. The Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service has addressed this question, and we questioned Treasury officials when we took evidence on the Budget. They said clearly that any claims that TESSA would increase the overall volume of savings were invalid. It will involve switching money not from ordinary deposit accounts or current accounts but from other forms of saving. The Committee could find no one to say that TESSA would either mean people switching money from a liquid state to a savings account or do anything to increase the overall level of saving.

The claims by the Chancellor of the Exchequer that this is a Budget for saving were bogus and invalid. This is not just the common coin of political half-truths but a serious matter because under the Government the savings ratio has dropped sharply and one of our problems is lack of saving.

Mr. Lilley: I will examine the evidence to which the hon. Lady refers, but I doubt whether her interpretation of it will be the same as mine. I am sure that my officials did not say that most contributions to TESSAs would come from some other source than deposits already in the banks and building societies. We do not know where it will come from, but undoubtedly a great deal of it will come from money already in the banking system. It will be rendered less liquid by being put into TESSAs.

The hon. Member for Leeds, West said that this was a measure to redeem the tax cuts made in the 1988 Budget. That is not the case. We are trying, by the period of high interest rates through which it is necessary to go, to ensure that borrowing is discouraged and saving is encouraged, and to bring about a balance between the two. We welcome the fact that we now have much higher investment in the economy. Every pound of investment requires a pound of savings to finance it. We want a higher level of savings, so we want to encourage a climate in which savings are looked upon favourably. TESSA will contribute to the creation of a new climate, over and above the amount of money drawn into it, which could none the less be considerable. This is an important measure. It has been widely welcomed in the City, by savers and by hon. Members on both sides of the Committee. I commend the clause to the Committee.

Mr. Battle: The Financial Secretary to the Treasury seems to have narrowed the definition of "ordinary person". He has not acknowledged that many people will be excluded from the scheme. For example, not everyone has a bank account. Surely we should encourage people throughout the income range to take up savings.

It seems that the measure will not reach the many. It appears to be a residue of the trickle-down theory. It will not reach those on low pay. It will not involve the least well-off. I accept that the limit is £9,000, and that is why it is a small measure. It will be crucially undermined by the impact of interest rates on mortgages. Until 1980, the measure could have been useful for a low to middle-income family, but with the introduction of independent taxation for women, the majority of people in that band will not enjoy any tax advantages from TESSAs. It seems that TESSAs are most handy for middle and high-income, mortgage-free families and for single people. If they were not going out of fashion, it would seem to be a classic yuppie handout. That would seem to be so unless the impact of TESSAs can be widened to embrace the entire population.

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): The hon. Gentleman is forgetting that there are many on modest incomes and with modest cash flows who strive to amass some capital. That is why many of my right hon. and hon. Friends were keen that the capital cut-off point for social benefits should be increased from £8,000 to £16,000. We welcomed that increase. We are talking of material sums for people on modest incomes. We want to give incentives to them, through the tax system, to save more. I think that TESSAs will have quite a considerable impact on those who are paying tax and earning an income, and at the lowest levels.

Mr. Battle: I must disagree with the hon. Gentleman. We may find ourselves in dispute over the term "modest income". I have tried clearly to identify income bands in which people will not be able to take up TESSAs. As I have said, they will not be available to most of my constituents. I represent part of west Yorkshire, an area which has the lowest pay rates in the country. I must add that it has the highest saving rates.

Mr Beith: And the Halifax building society.

Mr. Battle: There is a savings tradition, and my right hon. and hon. Friends and I are not opposed in principle to saving. We are questioning whether TESSAs represent a wide-ranging measure. They might prove to be the result of a rather narrow measure. As a throw-away line, I suggest that they might prove to be Now Only the Rich Man's Answer. That would produce the sort of acronym for which the Minister was looking.

Mr. Lilley: I shall not respond to the final part of the response of the hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). I merely say that I wish that I had thought of it myself.

The hon. Gentleman argued that his constituents, or many of them, will not benefit from TESSAs. There are 34 million people with deposits in banks and building societies. Of that total, 14 million are not taxpayers and therefore will benefit from the abolition of composite rate tax. I am sure that he will welcome that. The other 20 million are taxpayers, and they will be able to benefit from establishing TESSAs if they so wish. I know that we have made considerable progress, but I do not think that we are yet a nation of 20 million yuppies.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I am disappointed that the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has not responded to the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) about credit unions, with which I much agreed. Credit unions are a genuinely practical way in which people in deprived areas can help themselves. In a particularly deprived part of my constituency, people are trying to work together to establish a credit union. I appreciate that that is not strictly relevant to a debate about TESSAs, but the people that my hon. Friend and I are talking about would find it difficult, if not impossible, to take advantage of TESSAs. A credit union, however, is a way in which such people can help themselves and in turn help their own communities. I do not know whether the Minister has had an opportunity to consider the concept of credit unions on other occasions. I sincerely hope that the Government will look favourably on that sort of local initiative.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 23 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 25

AUTHORISATION AND OTHER STATUTORY CONTROLS

Mr. Beith: I beg to move amendment No. 44, in page 16, line 45, leave out

'at the time the trust was established' and insert 'immediately after the disposal'.

The Temporary Chairman (Mr. Michael Shersby): With this is will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 45, in page 17, line 9, leave out 'subsection (4).'.

No. 46, in page 17, line 37, leave out 'subsection (7).'.

Mr. Beith: It is no secret that my party has been committed to employee share ownership schemes since long before I was old enough to be a member of it. It has campaigned on the issue time and again over the years. It made progress during the Lib-Lab pact, during which new legislation was introduced on share ownership. I am pleased to say that that ownership is widening. My party continues the campaign, it is glad that the Government show a significant interest in employee share ownership plans and other forms of wider share ownership, and it will continue to urge them on, year by year, to do more.

The Bill is helpful but my colleagues and I wish to suggest some ways in which employee share ownership schemes can be taken further. We believe that the concept is good in principle. It gives the employee a stake in the firm for which he works, a greater involvement in its affairs and an opportunity to share in its prosperity, not merely through the wages paid for work but through the direct fruit of the dividend on the company's profits. Wider share ownership often has a transforming effect in the workplace as more and more of a company's employees become committed by their share ownership, as well as by their work, to the success of the company. We therefore want to give this form of share ownership as much encouragement as possible.

I hope that that feeling has spread widely, even into areas of the Labour and trade union movement which were initially hostile to wider share ownership. In the old days, it seemed to them—it may still seem so to some of them—to be an unfortunate breaking down of the traditional distinctions between labour and capital. I am in favour of that, and that is why I am so committed to wider share ownership schemes.

The amendments necessarily take us into a technical area. Under common law, a company can claim a tax deduction for the regular payments that it makes to an employee share ownership trust, provided that it can be shown that the payments are of revenue and not of capital. Whether the payments are revenue in nature is not always clear. Last year's Finance Bill, as it then was, created the qualifying employee share ownership trust. Payments made by a company to a qualifying trust could be guaranteed a tax deduction whether the payments were capital or revenue in nature. The relief provided by the relevant sections was so restrictive, however, that so far as I know the provisions have not been used. The efforts made by the Government in last year's Finance Bill therefore seem not to have borne fruit, unless the Minister has come across an example that I have not yet found.

In practice, trusts continue to prefer the relative uncertainty of the common law provisions to which I have referred. There are two principal reasons for that. First, the structure of a qualifying trust means that it does not fall within the exemptions to the Financial Services Act 1988. The trustees must register and comply with the rules of an appropriate FSA self-regulatory organisation. That costs money and is a rather bureaucratic complication for trustees who are not really interested in providing an investment service. They are there to distribute shares to employees and to obtain funds from the company for that purpose, and having to go through the mechanism of the Financial Services Act 1988 is not something that they anticipated. Secondly, all the employees of a company must participate as beneficiaries of the trust on similar terms. That means that there can be no discrimination between employees. That, too, has proved to be a restriction.

To make the qualifying trusts more popular, clauses 25 to 32 propose to give roll-over relief to gifts of shares made to a qualifying trust. Thus, a person selling shares to such a trust need not suffer capital gains tax on the sale, provided that the proceeds are reinvested in acquiring capital assets. That in itself is good but the existing restrictions and the additional restrictions in the Bill make it unlikely that the provision will make any contribution to the trusts taking off in a big way.

We have suggested a series of amendments designed to relax some of the existing restrictions and to remove the restrictions in the Bill, some of which are contained in parts of the Bill that we shall discuss in Standing Committee. I hope that the Minister will accept our general objective, which is to try to make the provisions usable—indeed, attractive—so as to help to create further trusts. We do not want the creation of trusts to continue to rely mainly on common law provisions which existed before this legislation.

8.30 pm

Amendment No. 44 is intended to allow the trusts to be established in advance. That is especially necessary where a new shelf company is being used as a vehicle for a management buy-out. Amendment No. 45 would delete a subsection which requires at least 10 per cent. of the ordinary share capital of a company to be in the hands of the trust. In a management buy-out, 60 to 80 per cent. of the equity is provided by institutions, with 20 to 40 per cent. being in the hands of managers and employees. In that context, a 10 per cent. threshold is unrealistically high. I do not understand why it is necessary, and I hope that the Minister will reconsider.

Amendment No. 46 would remove another subsection which denies relief to a vendor if the trustees of the trust make an offside transaction. That is unfair, because the vendor will have no control over the actions of the trustees. There are three areas where there are yet more restrictions which could lead to the continued inappropriateness, in the minds of potential trustees, of the whole Finance Act mechanism in launching employee share ownership plans. I shall discuss that further in Standing Committee.

Our intention is to make the Finance Bill provisions helpful and suitable in encouraging the creation of further employee share ownership plans. I hope that the Minister realises that something must be done if that objective is to be achieved.

Mr. Lilley: To the shock, horror, and consternation of the Committee, I accept amendment No. 44. The matter could be dealt with in either of the two suggested ways, but the way suggested by the hon. Gentleman has, on balance, at least as many advantages as the way it is dealt with in the Bill. As I am in a good mood, I accept the amendment and urge my hon. Friends to support it in the unlikely event of a Division.

On amendment No. 45, given the valuable nature of the new capital gains relief, there are certain conditions which the Bill requires to be met if it is to be obtained. One of those is that within a certain period the ESOP must have a 10 per cent. stake in the company to which the sale relates. Unlike some other employee share arrangements recognised in the tax system, ESOPs will often be concerned with large stakes in companies.

The new relief proposed in the Bill is very valuable and it is right that it should be confined to cases where employees are being given a significant stake in the company. The level of what should count as significant is inevitably a matter of judgment. We think that 10 per cent. strikes the right balance, representing as it does a stake large enough to ensure the employees a degree of involvement in the company's affairs, while not being so large as to make the new relief unattractive. It was also the lowest figure suggested in representations made by the main ESOP proponents.

To remove the test altogether would mean that the new relief would be available if only a tiny proportion of the company's shares were to pass to the ESOP trust. That would mean that relief could be claimed where the employees were being given no effective stake in the company, and the proprietors maintained total effective control. We do not think that giving relief in such circumstances could be justified, and I urge the Committee to reject the amendment.

Clause 25(7) denies the capital gains relief for share disposals to ESOPs if the ESOP breaks the conditions for qualifying ESOPs in the period running from the year in which the share disposal takes place to the year in which replacement assets are acquired. Amendment No. 46 would allow relief to be claimed in those circumstances.

The main effect of the amendment would be extra compliance and administrative work. In the absence of clause 25(7), relief would be allowed and then clawed back under clauses 28 to 30, which recover the relief where, at any time after the sale of shares, the ESOP breaks the rules. In the cases covered by clause 25(7), it will usually be known when the claim is made that the ESOP has broken the rules, and in those circumstances it saves everyone work to deny the relief from the outset, as clause 25(7) does. For that reason, I cannot commend the amendment to the Committee, but I appreciate the manner in which the amendments were proposed.

Mr. Beith: I am grateful to the Minister for accepting amendment No. 44. I hope that it is a good sign and that we can further tidy up these parts of the Bill in Standing Committee. I hope that many other Liberal Democrat amendments will be accepted.

I fully appreciate and accept the reasoning behind the 10 per cent. threshold in general. However, I wonder whether the management buy-out aspect has been properly considered. To achieve a management buy-out, it is necessary for there to be a large institutional stake. If the managers are to be fully committed, they also require a significant stake. I shall take further advice on whether there is any other way to deal with that. I hope that the Minister's officials will also give it further thought. I am at one with the Minister in thinking that at least a 10 per cent. stake is usually desirable, but I should not want a management buy-out to be frustrated by that.

I shall reflect on the Minister's response to amendment No. 46. His key point was that in most cases relief will not be claimed until it is clear whether the trust has behaved as it should. My anxiety is that the person who will be denied the relief is the vendor, who has no control over the actions of those who could cause him to lose it. I appreciate the Minister's acceptance of amendment No. 44.

Amendment agreed to.

Question proposed, That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: The clause is welcome and we do not wish to divide the House on this or subsequent clauses that deal with ESOPs. We wish only to explore technical matters of detail. I am sure that the clauses will go through Committee in a reasonably speedy and workmanlike way. That is in keeping with our approach during the past two years. This is the third year that we have discussed employee share ownership plans—or employee share ownership trusts, depending on which nomenclature people prefer.

The schemes appear to have drawn support from both sides of the House. We have arrived at a peculiar bipartisan approach, but for different reasons. Conservative Members view ESOPs as a form of popular capitalism, whereas we realise that they are an appropriate vehicle for workers' control, as our policy review makes clear.

Mr. Norman Lamont: It is the other way round.

Mr. Brown: I guess that the Chief Secretary is referring to the fact that workers' control has brought about appropriate vehicles because a large number of ESOPs are privatised bus companies——

Mr. Ian Taylor: That is a good joke.

Mr. Brown: It is all the better for being spontaneous.

The approach of the House to these issues was set during the passage of the Finance Bill last year by that opinion former, the man we thought of—just for a few minutes, no longer—as Red Norman. He said:

"In a free enterprise economy, there is room for many different forms of ownership, which can include a number of companies where a majority of shares are owned by the labour force. If the increasing awareness of and interest in ESOPs results in more worker-owned companies, I should not regret that . . . Anything that could encourage more membership by the work force in the unquoted sector is to be welcomed."—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 6 June 1989; columns 304-5.]

That ringing incitement to the work force to take over their companies made my hon. Friends and myself draw breath. Indeed, given his previous disappointments in the appointments to the Cabinet, we thought that the right hon. Gentleman was making a bid for election to the shadow Cabinet instead. For those few moments one or two of us might even have considered supporting him. Of course, events moved on, and we were pleased that the right hon. Gentleman has found his rightful place in the appropriate Cabinet and has not resiled from his views on employee share ownership trusts.

It is only fair to point out that all the trusts so far relate to private companies. That is the way in which the law to date has affected the transfer of shares in public companies. The hon. Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor) has spoken on the point on a number of occasions and may take justifiable pride in the clause that is before us. For the first time the measure will give an advantage to Finance Bill schemes over case law ESOPs, which many of us felt were hitherto in a more privileged position.

The clause, and those subsequent upon it, will provide roll-over tax relief if the shares are sold into an ESOP. That relief was not available before. The requirements for democratic distribution of the shares remain, as do the requirements for worker trustees. All that is on the right lines, but there are remaining problems, and the clause is wide enough for us to discuss them.

The overriding problem relates particularly to private companies. Although I mention it, it does not detract from my overall support for the clause. If a company is doing badly, there is not a great temptation to the work force to purchase it; naturally it would be reluctant to do so. If a company is doing well, unfortunately it is the case in British industry that those who run it want to retain it. There are still more tax-efficient methods of rewarding executives for the contribution that they make to the company. Indeed, it is widely felt in British board rooms that executives need incentives. The same view does not seem to have been transferred to the approach to the rest of the work force. Far too many British board rooms still seem to think that their work force needs to be competitive and priced down rather than given incentives and further involvement.

There are other difficulties that pertain particularly to the ESOT structure. It is still the case that a majority of the trustees of the ESOT have to be employees. I hope that the Financial Secretary will consider the matter again, perhaps not now but for future Finance Bills. I am sure that the commitment given by his predecessor to review the issue year by year continues. In the larger ESOTs, the need for professional, financial and other expert advice is not just necessary but of overwhelming importance. No doubt some of the larger ESOTs could not function unless such professional advice was available.

In issues that are fairly complex, the existing employee trustees not only have to form a majority, and therefore take responsibility ultimately—if they are all voting the same way—for decisions, but they are also completely exposed to personal liability. I understand the reasons for it, but those two burdens are heavy ones to place on people who ideally should be shop floor workers. To mix their involvement with the involvement of professional advisers, experts in their own spheres, seems to be desirable. The burden of complete personal liability is very heavy and is not an inducement to an ordinary working person to seek election.

I want to take the opportunity to praise members of the different work forces in the road transport industry in particular and in other industries for having taken an adventurous step in coming forward to undertake a burdensome office on behalf of their fellow workers. It is a heavy responsibility to shoulder. The individuals to whom I have spoken are very conscious of that.

I also want to take the opportunity to praise the Unity Trust bank which, as hon. Members who follow the matter know, is the main financial backer of employee share ownership trusts. Without the encouragement that the bank has given to such schemes, many of them would not have got under way.

8.45 pm

The Financial Secretary should consider for future Financial Bills the inclusion in ESOTs of regular part-time workers as well as full-time employees. I am not talking about people on short-term contracts. I see the difficulties there, but it should be possible for people who are permanently employed, but for a smaller number of weeks, to be involved in the ESOT, even on a pro rata basis, although ideally they should have full-time involvement.

The new relief is designed to be limited to sales of shares in qualifying ESOPs. It will provide a boost for them at the expense of the case law ESOPs. As the Financial Secretary said in answer to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), the relief is limited by a number of tests. It is limited particularly to ESOPs set up by trading companies or trading groups. The Finance Act 1989 allowed investment companies to set up ESOPs. Indeed, no reason was put forward at the time as to why investment companies should not set up ESOPs.

Of course, it gave them the corporation tax deductions consequent upon that. However, clause 25 and the subsequent clauses will not allow an investment company ESOP the roll-over tax relief. I understand that tax avoidance issues may be involved. Given everything that I have said on tax avoidance in the past, it would be wrong for me not to be conscious of the potential. If the Financial Secretary says that that is his defence, I shall certainly understand his motivation. However, it is right to explore it further and that is what I hope to do.

I understand the position to be that a qualifying ESOP can be set up by a non-trading investment company—that was common ground on last year's Finance Act—and that the new roll-over relief cannot be claimed for the sale of shares in such a company to its ESOP. That is what we are deciding this year. I accept that it is in line with the general view of the Inland Revenue that trading companies or groups are more commercial and less easy to manipulate for tax purposes. That is probably right.

However, we have to ask whether the Government's approach is wholly consistent. If investment companies are intrinsically undesirable, why should we have allowed them to establish qualifying ESOPs in the first place? If clause 25 and the succeeding clauses are intended to encourage shareholders to sell to ESOPs rather than to creditors or others, how does the restriction help? I do not put those questions to the Financial Secretary in a spirit of animosity, because I realise that tax avoidance issues may sit alongside my remarks. Nevertheless, I shall welcome a response from him in his summation of the debate.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed referred to the 10 per cent. test contained in clause 25(4). As a test, it is arbitrary, and I was much taken with the Financial Secretary's statement that it represented the lowest test of all the representations that the Government received from interested groups.

Why is such a test needed? Although I followed what the Financial Secretary said to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed, that question still merits an answer, because, although the 10 per cent. test is less strict than the 25 per cent. test used at one stage in the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979, it is stricter than the section 85 rule, for general offers, which has no threshold.

If an ESOP currently holds 2 per cent. of the founding company's shares, why should relief be available if Peter sells 8 per cent. of his 29 per cent. shareholding, but not be available to Nick if he sells all of his 7 per cent. shareholding? Why should relief become available to Nick only if Peter later decides to sell 2 per cent. of his shareholding to the ESOP? The threshold sets up those ambiguities. Has the Financial Secretary thought of a way through, or does he believe that such ambiguities are consequent upon the setting of any threshold? I suspect that that is the answer.

I must raise a number of drafting issues with the Financial Secretary. Clause 25(5) states that the claimant must obtain consideration. That would be difficult to interpret and I am not sure that it is right. Can the Financial Secretary justify inclusion of that phrase in the clause? Similarly, in clause 25(7), am I to understand—I may have got it wrong—that a small chargeable event could mean that roll-over relief would be completely denied? I am sure that that is not the Government's intention, but the clause could be interpreted in such a way. Could the Financial Secretary respond a little more fully than simply to say that that is not his intention, and that it could not be interpreted in such a way?

Clause 25(5) states that all the consideration must be used to purchase replacement assets. Surely that is contradicted by clause 27(2), which we shall discuss further in Standing Committee. At this stage, I merely want to draw the Financial Secretary's attention to the fact that clause 27(2) and clause 27(3) enable partial roll-over relief. If that is enabled by clause 27, why should clause 25(5) say that it is not?

In principle, the relief given in clause 25 is much wider than existing roll-over relief. It extends to the acquisition of almost any type of chargeable asset and to assets the eventual sale of which is unlikely in practice to cause capital gains tax to be paid.

I must return to the issue of tax avoidance, where my sympathies are entirely with the Inland Revenue. The clause may provide substantial possibilities for avoidance, and I should like the Financial Secretary to tell us how much consideration the Government have given to that issue and precisely what steps they have taken to minimise avoidance, which is implicit in the clause.

Relief is aimed principally at sales of shares to an ESOP at full market value. How will the clause cope with what I should have thought were socially desirable steps—I should have thought that they were desirable to the Government, too—for example, when shares are gifted to an ESOP or sold at a lower or nominal value? I am sure that the Government will have considered that matter in general, but how does the clause affect it in particular? I am sure that we would all agree that the sort of thing to be encountered is when the owner of a small or medium-sized company, which is not asset-rich, is retiring or seeking to leave for other reasons and the company can be given over to the work force. The tax system should positively encourage such an idea. As the hon. Member for Esher has said in previous debates, at least the system should not provide a positive disincentive.

As I am sure hon. Members will appreciate, these are technical matters and they are difficult to popularise. Nevertheless, the events that lie behind the drier points that we are discussing today are serious, and have had a profound effect on the lives of a number of working people, whose companies have been transformed from municipally owned undertakings or companies that traded in the public sector into employee share ownership trusts.

Many trade union branches have been involved in such transfers. The bus industry is the prime example. Unions had to think long and hard before encouraging their members to enter into such undertakings. I note on the latest list of such groups that the Buswise group on Tyne and Wear, with some 18,000 employees, is by far the largest existing ESOP.

My constituents ask me whether they should enter into such an undertaking. They also ask, as well they might, given my current duties on the Opposition Front Bench, what will happen when the Government change. Will their investment in the ESOP be for naught? Will the risk that they have taken come to nothing if the municipal bus trust is taken back into public ownership? It is not our intention to take such trusts back into public ownership. Our commitment to an integrated passenger transport network in the metropolitan areas can be carried out without renationalising enterprises which we regret have been put into such difficult positions.

I applaud the endeavours of employees of ESOPs to take the best possible option available to them in the most intractable circumstances. They were placed in such circumstances by the Government and not due to economic circumstances or anything else. They have taken a brave step and next year, or the year after, we may well be discussing the affairs of people working in community care who are also considering whether, given the changes that the Government are making, ESOPs are the vehicle for them. People in that walk of life are looking carefully at what has happened in the bus industry.

ESOPs have a much wider future than merely providing a refuge of last resort for municipal undertakings that are being privatised. I regret that debate has sometimes been too narrowly focused on privatisation. There are many good things about ESOPs and I hope that, with continued encouragement from the Opposition and, in fairness, with the good will that has come from the Government as well, albeit for different reasons, we shall eventually arrive at the point where ESOPs are not only desirable in theory but positively attractive in practice.

9 pm

Mr. Ian Taylor: It is an annual pleasure to follow the jovial hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) in debates on employee share ownership, and today is no exception. I will pass on to him a message given to me by the managing director of another bus company, who said that, when the shares passed into the hands of the workers in that bus company, for the first time the buses stopped for passengers, so there is hope for the hon. Gentleman if he is late for a meeting in Tyne and Wear.

This is one of the remarkable subjects that seems to unite the House. It unites the supporters of Karl Marx and Adam Smith and, in deference to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), probably Lloyd George —I do not know the latest guru of the Liberal Democrats.

Just to show that I am a good party man at heart, I should say that, although the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East said that he saw ESOPs as a means of workers' control, it is important that he should explain to some of his colleagues that workers may end up in control through a progressive transfer of shares into their hands which, if it happens, is a good thing, but that workers' control, in some sort of socialist sense, should not be the sole justification for employee ownership. It is better to start at 1, 2 or 3 per cent. if that is all that is possible, than to hold out for 51 per cent. I have often found on platforms that that understanding has not spread completely through the Labour party, but I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will continue to spread the gospel of popular capitalism, even if he calls it something else.

I welcome clause 25. It represents satisfaction of one of the most important of the submissions that were made to the Treasury last year when we were considering some of the implications of the introduction of the qualifying ESOP in the Finance Act 1989. I also particularly welcome the 10 per cent. criterion. The Americans have a 30 per cent. criterion, so the Treasury has been excessively generous. I withdraw the word "excessively" as it might set a precedent, but the Treasury has certainly been generous in bringing in the 10 per cent. criterion.

My only worry would be that 10 per cent. is still a substantial number of shares if they all come in one go. One thing that we shall be looking at in Standing Committee is whether it is possible, using only the 1978 Act scheme, for 10 per cent. of a company to pass out to shareholders during the seven-year period, which is one of the qualifying conditions. That is in no way a criticism —it is merely an attempt to ensure that there is a possibility of understanding whether the seven-year rule is sufficient.

Sadly, during the past year there has been difficulty in persuading companies to use the qualifying employee share ownership trust set up in last year's Finance Act. Trusts have been set up under the case law, as the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East said, but those of us who believe that this should become a proper system, widely understood, with clear tax provisions, welcome the fact that it is proposed that, under clause 25, the roll-over relief will apply only to transfers of shares into a qualifying share option trust. That seems to make the qualifying route much more popular and is certainly a boost to it in comparison with the case law version.

I want briefly to draw attention to two other points which could transform some of the attitudes of potential appliers of ESOPs because they were not available until recently. The first is the fact that the Companies Act 1989 came into force on 1 April 1990. That was an important provision, giving companies the ability to guarantee the borrowings of an employee benefit trust. That is something which many of us wanted early on, and now that it has come in, I think that it will attract the attention of practitioners.

I was delighted when my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary announced in a written answer on 9 May—at column 123 of Hansard—that a clearance procedure was to be introduced, and was under discussion by the Inland Revenue. Tax advisers are used to telephoning the Inland Revenue and obtaining clearance procedures for other financial purposes. Given the complexities of employee share ownership schemes, and the similarity of terms provisions, they felt that such procedures were necessary here.

In many instances, lack of clearance procedure made the case law version more desirable. The matter needed to be tidied up, and I thank my hon. Friend the Financial Secretary for doing that.

I believe that the Treasury could make further gestures to remove some of the cotton wool around the employee share ownership plan. All the hon. Members who have spoken tonight want the ESOP scheme to expand. If it is to expand, companies and their advisers must regard it as a vehicle that is not only a sensible way to spread capital to workers, but something that will not cause horrendous corporate problems. It must be something that firms see as meeting their objectives.

Although I have always favoured the similarity of terms provisions, I have a slight doubt as to whether we should always insist upon it, as it seems to be a disincentive for many firms which cannot decide whether to introduce the schemes. Some firms seem not to believe that running an ESOP with similarity of terms provisions in parallel with the 1984 executive share option scheme is sufficient. To date I have always thought that it was, but there is an increasing volume of evidence to the contrary.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East raised some good points about part-time workers. Increasingly, they will be an essential part of any labour force, and part-time workers who have a proper contract should be beneficiaries under an employee share ownership plan.

In Committee last year I raised the question of capital gains tax liability within a trust if the trust disburses shares at a higher price than that at which it first bought them that would involve double taxation.

It is interesting that many of the people who advise companies on whether to adopt a qualifying employee share trust—especially those from the Unity Trust bank —are concerned about the trustee clauses, not only in regard to personal liability but because of the complexity of an election among the workers. My hon. Friend the Financial Secretary should consider whether there should be an alternative system. Appointing as trustees one representative each from the work force and management, plus an independent adviser, would simplify matters. That is not an anti-union suggestion—I think that it would find widespread support among Opposition Members.

As for the seven-year period during which shares must be distributed to the individual beneficiaries, I support the requirement to get shares into the hands of individuals as soon as possible. That is an essential part of individual share ownership, which is inherent in the employee share ownership trust principle. We are not moving into an institutional shareholding area. The problem emerges when a substantial number of shares could be obtained by the employee trust. It is then difficult to get them out within the seven-year period if only the 1978 Act is used, particularly if a company wanted to make available one 1978 Act share plus one other share, difficulties would be involved. We may need to consider either extending the period or altering the point at which tax arises when a share is distributed to an employee outside a 1978 Act scheme. Perhaps employees could get some roll-over relief so that they pay tax when they realise a share as opposed to when they receive it.

There is not time to discuss technical matters this evening, but in fairness to the Standing Committee, it was worth while flagging them. The Government have done an excellent job. Industry and practitioners have been flabby and slightly weak-willed about introducing the scheme. I hope that we can now toughen them up. The giving of taxation reliefs only to a qualifying trust should make that much more attractive, and I hope that in the coming months we shall see a fairly rapid and wide rise of employees becoming shareholders through that system. That would be extremely welcome. One of the great objectives of the next 10 years is spreading capital through share ownership. This is one measure in which the Government can justifiably take pride.

Mr. Lilley: We have had an excellent debate with knowledgeable speeches by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) and my hon. Friend the Member for Esher (Mr. Taylor), both of whom have acquired expertise outside the House and, I suspect, from paying more attention to finance debates than I did previously. I have had to make up for lost time in studying this important subject.

It is useful to know that, having said a few words in favour of co-operatives, if I now advocate ESOPs as a vehicle for worker control I can hope to pick up some votes in the Labour party national executive elections, should I be so inclined. I was a little surprised by some of the inquiries of the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, who did not feel it was necessary to have a majority of worker trustees or to transfer a minimum amount to employees. I thought that he might have been making a bid for membership of our Cabinet, so that he and I could pass en route.

The Government have consistently supported and encouraged employee share ownership. Privatisations have always included valuable and widely seized opportunities for employees to obtain shares on very favourable terms and, more generally, we have introduced and extended a wide range of tax relief in 10 out of the last 11 annual Budgets. We estimate that up to March last year, the latest date for which figures are available, all-employee share schemes resulted in 2 million employees receiving shares or options over shares with an intitial market value of some £5 billion.

Against that background, we introduced our legislation on ESOPs last year. My right hon. Friend explained then the difference between approved employee share schemes and ESOPs, and acknowledged that ESOPs have a particular role to play in the unquoted company sector.

The clauses provide a futher tax relief to encourage the establishment of statutory ESOPs. The relief takes the form of a capital gains tax deferral for sales of shares to ESOPs. The clauses set out the conditions to be met if relief is to be obtained, the nature of the relief and provide for its recovery if the statutory ESOP subsequently ceases to meet the qualifying conditions.

ESOPs involve trusts, set up for the benefit of a company's employees, which invest in the company's shares and then distribute them to its work force.

Following discussions with the main proponents of ESOPs, sections 67 to 74 and schedule 5 of last year's Finance Act provided relief from corporation tax for company contributions to ESOP trusts. Relief is due provided certain conditions are met. They are designed to secure the Government's objectives for ESOPs. First, individual employee share ownership in the companies in which they work should be extended. Secondly, it should be on an all-employee, similar-terms basis. That is valuable, despite the slight wavering of my hon. Friend the Member for Esher. Such ownership should be provided as promptly as possible, and it should be under arrangements that do not lend themselves to the sort of criticism that we have heard of ESOPs abroad, where they can be used for poison pill operations and the like.

9.15 pm

In line with the commitment given by my predecessor during last year's Standing Committee debates, we have kept a close watch on developments, and I have had meetings with those most closely concerned with promoting ESOPs.

The case for giving a further incentive to ESOPs has been strongly put to us, and, consistent with our underlying aim of ensuring individual employee ownership on reasonable terms and within a reasonable time, we have decided to demonstrate our continued commitment to ESOPs by introducing this further relief. We hope that this up-front capital gains tax relief will make the difference in some cases between a company deciding to set up an ESOP or not. We hope that the existence of the relief will persuade owners of shares in unquoted companies to sell them to an ESOP. Comments made since the Budget strengthen our hope that that will be so.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Esher and the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East for the broad support that they have given to the relief, and I welcome their contributions. My hon. Friend the Member for Esher, who has established a position as probably the leading exponent of ESOPs in the House, welcomed our 10 per cent. rule and remarked that it was more generous than the 30 per cent. rule that obtains in the United States of America. None the less, he wondered whether it might prove higher than necessary. ESOPs will often be concerned with large stakes in the company concerned. They may often rely on borrowings and individual contributions; distributions may, in consequence, take some time. Up to seven years is allowed under the 1989 legislation; a 1·4 per cent. per annum transfer does not seem excessive.

My hon. Friend the Member for Esher correctly remarked that the changes under the Companies Act 1989 have only just come into effect and that they will provide greater stimulus to statutory ESOPs, along with the new incentive. The fact that Companies Act changes have only recently come into force may be why we have not seen much sign of activity in statutory ESOPs. We would not expect to know about them because it takes some time before they come to the notice of the authorities.

My hon. Friend welcomed the clearance procedure that I recently announced. He said that it was under consideration, but it is established and available to those setting up trusts.

My hon. Friend reinforced the inquiry made by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East about the position of part-time workers. ESOPs can distribute to part-time workers as long as they are distributed through an approved all-employee arrangement.

The last point that my hon. Friend the Member for Esher made was about capital gains tax if shares are sold at a higher price than that for which they were acquired. We have received some interest, but not much. Given the freedom of operation available to ESOPs, unlike approved employee share schemes, large amounts could be involved and there would be the risk, if these reliefs were given, of ESOPs being used solely as tax shelters. We are determined that that should not happen. ESOPs should serve only as a means of furthering individual employee share ownership and as a means of producing it without unnecessary delay. To exempt their income and gains would encourage ESOPs to delay for as long as possible the distribution of shares to employees.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East made constructively comments. He said that, if a company was doing badly, employees would not wish to take up shares via an ESOP and that, if it was doing well, they would not be able to afford to do so. In fact, quite a number of ESOPs are the result of shares being gifted to employees. I am happy to say that all the schemes of which I am aware are in successful companies. They seem to have overcome the obstacles foreseen by the hon. Gentleman.

Perhaps I can spell out a little more clearly the position of part-time employees. The benefits for an ESOP trust could be substantial and, although distributions must be on an all-employee similar terms basis, there is scope for variation, depending on length of service and level of remuneration. It seems right to restrict those benefits to those who make the most substantial contributions to the success of their company. If, however, the ESOP trust operates in conjunction with a profit-sharing scheme trust, where the tax relief is more narrowly confined, part-time employees may still be allowed to benefit, as they frequently are under these schemes.

Mr. Beith: Will the hon. Gentleman settle for the first answer?

Mr. Lilley: The answers are more or less the same. If the hon. Gentleman studies the text, he will find that one answer was more condensed than the other.

The hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East said that shop floor workers who are trustees bear full liability and that this is a burdensome responsibility. In fact, companies are able to indemnify them against the responsibility. That would ease the burden and help employee trustees to play a full part, which is what we want to happen.

Exclusion of relief for investment companies was tentatively queried by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. He was right in his suspicion that this restriction has been introduced to prevent tax avoidance. Our contacts with proponents of ESOPs suggest that interest in the new relief is likely to be related essentially to trading companies. If the relief were extended to investment companies, there would be a risk of it being abused for what are really sales and transfers of investments to third parties. I know that the hon. Gentleman would not wish that to happen any more than I do.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of inquiries about drafting matters. Clause 25(5) deals with whether the claimant must obtain consideration—CGT jargon for a sale. Normally gifts already attract CGT deferral under last year's rules for gifts. The hon. Gentleman asked whether under clause 25(7) even a small chargeable event would deny relief. I am afraid that that is the case. Substantial scope for abuse would be opened up if we differentiated between small and large-scale chargeable events. Again, this measure was introduced to prevent tax avoidance.

The hon. Gentleman asked whether relief was confined to all cases where all proceeds were reinvested. No; clause 27(3) extends relief to cases where part is reinvested. I was asked how the provisions would cope in terms of shares gifted to ESOPs. In most cases, gift holdover relief will be available where shares are given to ESOPs and, where it is not, the new relief will be available.

I hope that I have dealt with most of the points raised by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East. If on studying the Official Report I find that questions have not been answered or have been inadequately answered, I shall either write to him or take the opportunity in the pleasurable meetings which we are scheduled to hold on Tuesdays and Thursdays henceforth to respond more fully to his points. I am grateful for hon. Members' constructive and knowledgeable contributions to the debate.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 25, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill (Clauses 3, 9, 10, 20, 23, 25 and 68), reported, with amendments; to lie upon the Table.

Personal Equity Plans

9.25 pm

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): I beg to move,

That the Personal Equity Plan (Amendment) Regulations 1990 (S.I., 1990, No. 678), dated 20th March 1990, a copy of which was laid before this House on 21st March, be revoked.

We tabled a prayer on these regulations because we thought that it would be useful to discuss some of the issues of anxiety to which the personal equity plan system and the changes proposed in the statutory instrument give rise. We do not intend to divide the House on the matter, but we wish to flag up several issues which give us pause for thought.

Personal equity plans were initially announced in the Budget of March 1986 with a start date in January the following year. At that stage, a limit of £2,400 was placed on the annual investment qualifying for a PEP. Provided that the shares were held for a minimum period of between 12 and 24 months, any capital gains and reinvestment dividends were free of tax. In the 1988 Budget, the annual limit was raised from £2,400 to £3,000. In 1989, the annual limit was raised again, from £3,000 to £4,800. It is worth recalling that the overall increase was well over 50 per cent.

The regulations before us raise that annual limit of £4,800 still further, to £6,000. That is a 25 per cent. increase in one calendar year. The House will note that the successive increases in each of the three years were well over the rate of inflation. The overall increases in the annual limit are extremely generous. Therefore, it was with some surprise that when I looked at the Red Book to see what figure was included for the cost of the changes to personal equity plans this year, I found that the item was marked as carrying a negligible cost.

Given the fairly dramatic increase in take-up of PEPs in the past 12 months, I fail to understand why the cost of a substantial increase in the annual limit can be regarded as negligible. It will lead—admittedly with a time lag of at least a year—to considerable taxation benefits in terms both of capital gains and of income tax on dividends. It would be useful to have some further thoughts from the Financial Secretary about why that estimate has been included in the Red Book.

We have a number of criticisms to make of personal equity plans in general. I should make it clear, as I have done a number of times to many different audiences in the City and elsewhere, that Labour Members will honour the tax treatment of those shares that are included in the PEPs portfolios, and the income from them, when we come to Government.

Our criticisms of PEPs are, first, that they have tended to benefit larger investors, repackaging existing portfolios of shares, rather than encourage new investors to come into the equity market. The Financial Secretary will doubtless recall that when we had an extremely interesting discussion on that precise point about a year ago the then Financial Secretary, now elevated to Chief Secretary, maintained that the take-up of PEPs was being substantially generated by new, small savers, rather than by larger investors.

We did not agree then, and we do not agree now, as experience and logic seem to show that precisely the opposite is the case. That is especially true in logic, because, to take best advantage of a PEP, remembering that the key advantage lies in capital gains tax relief rather than income tax relief, one has to have already exceeded the £5,000 threshold for capital gains tax purposes. The small-scale saver with a handful of shares will certainly not find himself in that position. Studies carried out by the Institute for Fiscal Studies seem to show that, by and large, PEPs are being used by people with large-scale shareholdings, and the benefits are considerable in those cases.

Secondly, we doubt whether it is wise to have accorded PEPs far more favourable tax treatment than any other sort of saving. When we debated PEPs last year, one matter that I pressed on the Government was the removal of the composite rate tax system for building society interest. I am delighted that the Government actually listened to that, albeit a year later.

We find it odd, however, that PEPs have been given such special treatment within the tax system, even after the additional boost to savings of a number of different kinds that the Finance Bill and Budget have provided. For example, the increase in the annual limit for PEPs has gone up by well over 100 per cent. in two years. That is in contrast with the treatment in the Finance Bill of the tax-exempt limit for friendly societies, which we shall be discussing soon in Standing Committee. The increase in that limit has been from £100 to £150—an overall increase of 50 per cent., and the last increase was five years ago. The contrast becomes absolutely clear—a more than 100 per cent. increase in the overall limit for PEPs over three years, but a figure of 50 per cent. over five years for friendly societies. We do not regard that as even-handed.

Thirdly, we believe that PEPs by and large serve in the equity markets merely to recycle existing equities. Of course there is a place in the economy for such recycling, but do we really want to give such generous tax treatment to encourage it? On the whole, PEPs do not encourage or facilitate the creation of new wealth or enterprise—they encourage people to continue making profits out of existing wealth and enterprise.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that, if PEPs were structured so as to include employee shareholders within companies, that might be a way of encouraging employees of companies to take, by way of bonus or other dividend, shares within the company for which they work, thus giving them greater involvement within the company?

Mr. Smith: I do not think that my hon. Friend was present for our last debate, when my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) set out in extremely learned and expert fashion the constructive view that we take of employee share ownership trusts. In our view, they are perhaps a more appropriate and useful vehicle for encouraging share-owning participation by workers in their companies than the sort of scheme that my hon. Friend has in mind.

Nevertheless, I would point out to my hon. Friend, for whom I have great respect, that his idea is an important one. We should certainly want to examine ways of using the tax system to encourage new enterprise and business in our economy, but I fear that PEPs are a very badly targeted vehicle for achieving that end. That is why we have doubts about the precise benefits that PEPs, with their enormous tax advantages, can bring.

The statutory instrument has two major defects, the first of which—the rise in the annual limit from £4,800 to £6,000—I have already mentioned briefly. There is a danger that that substantial increase may render nugatory all the other changes to improve savings of other sorts that the Chancellor is making in the Finance Bill. If we advance the case in the tax system for PEPs by a much greater amount than the case for other forms of saving, other forms of personal saving are not necessarily thereby improved.

Our second and more important criticism of the order relates to regulation 7, which reduces to 50 per cent. the value of investments that must be held by unit trusts, funds of funds and investment trusts in United Kingdom companies. In other words, regulation 7 makes it easier for holders of PEPs, by means of various trusts and funds of funds, to hold their investments abroad instead of in this country.

The issue arose briefly during our discussions a year ago. At that time, the then Financial Secretary to the Treasury, now the Chief Secretary and presumably one of the authors of the document before us, said:

"we thought it only right to require that unit and investment trusts should invest mostly in United Kingdom equities."—[Official Report, 10 May 1989; Vol. 152, c. 951.]

We agree with that, but we now find a year later that the Government are placing before the House an order which reduces that requirement to 50 per cent. Tax relief should not be generously available on income derived from investments up to 50 per cent. of which can be held abroad.

Government policy should be not just about encouraging saving but about encouraging investment in Britain. The change in regulation 7 goes completely in the wrong direction. That is a grave error and we hope that the Government will have second thoughts. Despite our criticisms of PEPs as a whole, we think that the system should be used as far as possible to encourage investment in United Kingdom equities. Providing tax advantages and tax relief to facilitate investment abroad is not one of the priorities for which we want to see the tax system used.

9.42 pm

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): I was reassured to hear that the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) does not wish to divide the House this year. He divided the House and voted against the PEP scheme in the equivalent debate last year. That could be a milestone on the long road that the Labour party is taking towards popular capitalism, but we must not get too excited. Perhaps some of the hon. Gentleman's comments gave a rather different impression.

The Minister knows that I have been a critic of the PEP scheme from the start, not because I disagree with its objectives but because I do not think that it went far enough to meet them and in particular it did not go far enough to meet the objectives of extending share ownership to the largest possible number of people. That remains my criticism of the scheme and that is why I shall suggest further changes that should be made to it.

Before the Budget we outlined a series of measures designed to boost savings, and widen savings and share ownership. I am pleased to say that the Government have moved on some of our suggestions. The first of the three key elements that we suggest now, just as we did last year, is the abolition of composite rate tax on building society and bank accounts. I am pleased that the Government propose to do that in a year. The second is the extending of PEPs to bank and building society accounts, which to a large extent is met by the TESSA scheme. Our third measure is the creation of an alternative PEP scheme for people who are not liable to capital gains tax. The Government have not adopted that suggestion and have not yet addressed the issue.

The only major benefit of a PEP scheme is the capital gains tax relief that it provides. By definition, the vast majority of people whom one might wish to encourage to take out a PEP as an objective of widening share ownership have no capital gains tax liability at all. The people who are most likely to benefit from the present scheme are those who have already used up their considerable capital gains tax relief and must therefore possess a fairly substantial portfolio of shares in any case.

If the scheme is to be widened, it must contain reliefs that make it attractive to people who do not have any capital gains tax liability and are first-time share buyers or people who may at the moment own shares in one or two privatised companies, or perhaps in three such companies, and whose total portfolio is only £1,000. They will have no capital gains tax to pay, so they are a long way from needing such relief. Therefore, there must be some other form of relief. They get relief on dividends, but we know that that is small, and less than they would get if they had the same money in a bank or building society, as the divident income would be less than that from a bank deposit.

Our proposal was that there should be an alternative PEP scheme giving front-ended income tax relief on the money deposited in the scheme, but that nobody should be allowed to have both types of scheme. That would mean, if one was offering it to large numbers of people who have no or only a few shares, the opportunity of a real and encouraging tax relief. If the Government are serious about widening share ownership by means other than employee share ownership plans, they must widen the scheme in such a way. That is easily the most promising route to take if the PEP scheme is to fulfil the purposes for which it was originally set up.

The hon. Member for Hackney, North and Stoke Newington (Ms. Abbott), who serves on the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, referred to the exchanges in the evidence sessions of that Committee about whether this was a Budget to increase savings. The Chancellor was careful in his choice of words when questioned on the subject. He said that it was not a Budget for savings but a Budget for savers. In other words, it gave certain advantages to those who chose to save. He held out no hope that it would greatly extend or increase the amount of saving in the economy. Many people agree. I hope that there will be some increase.

A different social purpose would be achieved by widening the number of people who save, even if that did not increase greatly the savings ratio. It is socially desirable that more people should be encouraged to save and develop the habit of saving and that ownership of industry should be much wider. Therefore, the Government have missed the boat in not developing PEP in the way that I have suggested. That does not lead me to resist the changes that they are making this year, some of which will prove useful.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury referred to a point that came up both last year and this year, which is about what was last year the 75 per cent. rule, which will become this year the 50 per cent. rule, on the amount of investments by a trust that can be made overseas. That presents a problem to the Government. It appears to me to be a breach of the Prime Minister's Madrid conditions for entering the exchange rate mechanism. It is a restriction on capital movements of the sort that she told all other European Countries they must get rid of before Britain would join the ERM.

That point was emphasised and repeated by Lord Joseph in an article in the Financial Times, I think today. The Government had better produce an answer on that. This year, they have reduced the restriction from 75 to 50 per cent. but that restriction is still inconsistent with the principle of the single market and free movement of capital. The Government may say that it is a bargaining counter and that when other countries remove their restrictions we shall remove ours.

The widening of savings and share ownership is desirable. I shall support the Government's improvement of PEP but I wish that they would go much further.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South): When I intervened in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), I received the reply that my point had been partly dealt with in an earlier debate. I also received the assurance that my party is beginning to think along the lines of what is best for the capital market and the investment market. I suppose that I should declare a disappointed interest in PEP in that, in 1988, I bought into a scheme. It must be about the only one that ever lost money, and it managed to do so faster than the stock market was going down. I became a little disillusioned.

I have watched the limit rise from £3,000 to £4,800 and now to £6,000 and I have listened to what has been said about capital gains tax allowances. All the time one asks oneself, "What is the Treasury playing at?" We have PEPs, which have nil capital gains tax as long as one remains within their terms. In the old days there would be part unit trusts and part shares in the capital market. There had to be management, of course, and a great deal of money was made managing. Managers are now trying to reduce their charges and are becoming terribly competitive. The Government are allowing the unit trust element to fall to 50 per cent., and that means that 50 per cent. of the unit trust element will be invested abroad. More capital is leaving the country, and one begins to wonder what the Government are playing at.

The Government introduced similar schemes that were capital gains tax-free provided that they were held for long enough. Again, what are the Government playing at? Are they in favour of CGT or are they not? They are encouraging people to find schemes whereby they avoid CGT. If I had been sitting on the Government Benches last year listening to the Budget statement, I should have blown my top trying to think, as Conservative Members should, what the Government were doing. Effectively, they increased CGT by 33 per cent. They took it from 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. That was done by a Government who are meant to be interested in capital. There are schemes to avoid CGT, the Government have increased the rate of CGT and at the same time they are driving industry towards considering shareholdings from an income-providing point of view, not from the standpoint of capital growth. That means that companies have to pay a dividend, so capital flow is reduced. Companies have to borrow from the banks, which are doing rather nicely with a current borrowing rate of about 18 per cent. That is doing nothing to help industry.

My remarks are not Labour party policy and I may have to answer for some of them later, but be that as it may. If we try to apply a purely logical mind to capital investment in industry, we must ask whether we are to encourage investment for capital growth or income return. If people want income return, the obvious answer is to encourage them to invest in building societies, for example. The Japanese do things extremely well if a capital return is required. They encourage investment in companies with a view to capital growth. They do not discourage that by having the majority of investment taxed at 40 per cent., which is the income tax rate in any event. We do not encourage the small investor by taxing him because he invests in a single investment whereas if he goes to a managed fund he may well escape CGT.

If we encourage people to invest for capital growth by, for example, coupling the investment with a provision that states that if dividend is reinvested it will not be subject to taxation, there is a logical approach to be perceived. It is a fairly rational idea that is employed elsewhere. It stops companies distributing moneys, it allows reinvestment in the company and at the same time it means that companies do not have to borrow. With that approach I can understand people being encouraged to invest.

By and large, the small investor does not invest for income. He puts money away for a rainy day, and sometimes for the children. Sometimes he is making provision for something that will confront him in five or 10 years' time. If he realises that he will not pay tax on capital growth, there will be a considerable incentive for him to invest.

I appreciate that the fund managers will say, "If the pension funds find that there is no such thing as capital gains tax any more and there is only capital growth, not income growth, how are pensions to be paid?" I understand the argument, but logic tells me that the managers will dispose of some of their shareholdings from time to time. That might make the market move around a little.

At the end of the day, what is the logic of PEPs? Either we believe in capital gains tax or we do not. Perhaps the Minister will care to answer my question: do the Government believe in capital investment, or do they not? Do they believe in capital gains tax? If they do, why should two schemes be exempt from capital gains tax provided that they are held for long enough? If there is to be capital gains tax, let it be upon every gain.

If the Government do not believe in capital gains tax, they should have the courage to say so. Their action last year in raising it from 30 per cent. to 40 per cent. shows little sense if they do not believe in it, and they should abolish it. The market could then reconsider the value of capital growth as opposed to income growth. The Government must not play around. They should not use the idea of investment abroad together with an increase in the percentages because that encourages capital outflow rather than capital inflow and investment in Britain. The Government should come clean. It is either one or the other.

I am interested to know where the Government stand. The next general election cannot be too far away, and I am interested in what the Government propose thereafter. Will Britain become just an offshore island of Europe, or will we once again encourage investment in British industry? Will we encourage British industry to expand? Will we encourage fund managers to invest in British industry rather than abroad?

I hope that the Minister will give us a clue about the direction of his thoughts. If he is not thinking, and if his Department is not thinking, but simply dealing with each issue as and when it arises, please say so. At least that would be an honest answer and the House is entitled to know.

9.56 pm

The Financial Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peter Lilley): I thank the Opposition for providing an opportunity once again to debate personal equity plans, which are a tremendous Government success story. The success of our policies is evident in the figures from the latest stock exchange share ownership survey published at the time of the Budget. About 11 million people, or one adult in every four, now owns shares, compared with one in 14 in 1979. Share ownership is widely spread—two thirds of share owners are outside the ranks of professionals and managers and 60 per cent. are outside the south-east.

The Government remain committed to widening and deepening share ownership, building on the remarkable achievements to date, and PEPs are playing their full part in that. The effect of the measures that we have introduced to improve the attractiveness of PEPs is shown in the figures that I gave the House on 23 February. They showed that, by 31 December 1989, the number of plan managers had risen to 340 compared with 180 a year earlier. Some 300,000 plans were taken out in 1989 and the total amount contributed to PEPs has risen to £1·5 billion, not counting investment growth.

I am pleased to give the House the latest provisional figures for 5 April this year. In 1989-90, 400,000 plans were taken out and £1,200 million invested, both figures setting new records for PEPs. That brings the total number of plans taken out since PEPs started to nearly 850,000, and the total invested—ignoring investment growth—to almost £2 billion. Those figures do not reflect the impact of the changes that we announced in this year's Budget, which were implemented in the regulations that we are debating today.

In the Budget, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor made four significant further improvements to personal equity plans. First, the overall annual limit on annual investment goes up from £4,800 to £6,000. Secondly, the limit on qualifying unit and investment trusts rises from £2,400 to £3,000. Thirdly, the rule for qualifying unit and investment trusts is relaxed—they now need to hold at least 50 per cent. rather than 75 per cent. of their portfolio in United Kingdom ordinary shares. Fourthly, the amount which can be invested in unit and investment trusts not meeting that requirement goes up from £750 to £900.

Those measures are an important component of my right hon. Friend's Budget for savers. They will increase the amount that individuals can save, increase incentive for managers to market schemes, and remove obstacles facing investment trusts.

Those four changes are the meat of the regulations before us, but the regulations also sweep up some technical relaxations and clarifications which we announced last year. For example, regulation 6(1) clarifies the market value rule in the light of comments made by the Select Committee on Statutory Instruments last year. All in all, the effect of the changes in the regulations should be to make PEPs still more attractive. I look forward to an even more successful year than the last.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith) asked why the cost of the relief is negligible, given the excellent take-up to which I have referred.

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Motion in the name of Mr. Neil Kinnock relating to Income Tax may be proceeded with, though opposed, until half-past Eleven o'clock or until the end of a period of one and a half hours after it has been entered upon, whichever is the later—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

Question again proposed.

Mr. Lilley: The cost of the relief is simply the cost of tax forgone on capital gains made within the plans and on dividends paid into them. It is thus not a relief on the total amount of money put in. It only builds up over time. Often there will not be any gain that would have been taxed until the gain exceeds £5,000. In any case, most gains may not have been realised until later, so it is a long-term cost in terms of tax forgone. It builds up over time—hence the negligible figure.

Mr. Chris Smith: Am I right in thinking, therefore, that a cost is anticipated to the Exchequer in, say, three or four years but not in 12 months' time? If so, has the Treasury any idea of the likely cost?

Mr. Lilley: The hon. Gentleman is correct—the cost will build up in future. It may still be fairly small in the short time scale. I will let him know whether we have any estimates about how rapidly it will build up and whether I can give him any figures in our planning timetable.

The hon. Gentleman said that the relief has benefited larger investors, particularly those repackaging portfolios, and not the new investor. Last year the average amount committed to PEPs was only £3,000, whereas people could have invested £4,800 in a new plan or, because of a change in the regulations during the year, a total of £7,800. That suggests that the PEP is not just being used by people transferring a slug of a large existing portfolio each year into a plan to take advantage of the relief. Quite a few people are putting aside the amount that they can afford to save.

As for new investors, we have no direct information on what proportion of those taking out plans had not previously invested in equities. The hon. Gentleman referred to the survey by the Institute of Fiscal Studies, which suggested that one third of new plans were taken up by people who had had no equities before. If so, that is very encouraging news, especially as that would not include those who had privatised shares before. If we manage to increase by one third the total number of shareholders through the battery of measures that we are introducing, that will be a major achievement which will be welcomed by my hon. Friends. We have already trebled the number of shareholders. A further increase would be a major gain.

The suggestion was made that PEPs get a bigger tax advantage than any other form of saving. That is not the case. The tax relief on PEPs is arithmetically equivalent to relief given on pensions. Indeed, the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) proposed that, since the relief is no great advantage to those who have unused capital gains tax relief of £5,000, who are not making similar gains within PEPs, or who for other reasons are not getting a tax advantage, we should introduce front-ended relief.

I assure the hon. Member that front-ended relief, so long as one pays tax when one takes out money from a PEP, is arithmetically equivalent to relief given on PEPs but involves more regulatory problems because people try to use it as a tax avoidance device. Therefore, he would not achieve anything by going down that route that we do not achieve by the PEPs scheme. I think that that is the case —I am always hesitant at this time of night, and it took me a long time to convince a lot of people that that was true.

The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury contrasted the present PEPs rules with those for friendly societies. I agree that we have uprated the special tax privilege for friendly societies by only 50 per cent., to £150, but we also introduced a Green Paper stating that friendly societies will be allowed to handle PEPs, so they will be able to take full advantage of PEP relief.

Mr. Chris Smith: The Financial Secretary referred to the Green Paper on friendly societies. He will recall that last year, when he was Economic Secretary to the Treasury, we pressed hard for an anticipated date for the proposals contained in the Green Paper to be brought before the House. Can he give us a date now?

Mr. Lilley: I regret that I cannot give a specific date, but we have made progress by issuing a Green Paper and the matter is moving in the direction that the hon. Gentleman would wish. The nods and winks that I gave then about the timing of such a procedure are still valid. My hon. Friend the Economic Secretary has fingertip control of the whole legislative procedure.

My predecessor was quoted as saying that it was only right that most of the PEPs relief should be available for investment in United Kingdom equities. The hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury criticised the reduction in the requirement for qualifying investment trusts from 75 per cent. to 50 per cent. In practice, investment trusts will have to maintain more than 50 per cent. on average to avoid falling below the amount when they make changes in their portfolios. Therefore, the requirement for investment to be mainly in United Kingdom equities will in effect be maintained, and the average will be above 50 per cent.

Investment trusts told us that they found it difficult to be sure of meeting the 75 per cent. limit which previously obtained. Most trusts are not tailored exclusively for PEPs. Therefore, they have to have portfolios with attractions for people who do not have PEPs. A number of trusts run saving schemes which are desirable and can be matched with PEPs—people put a regular amount of money into a PEP. It is desirable to harness an investment trust behind a PEP. Therefore, we thought it right on balance to make such changes.

The hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed asked whether we were being sufficiently Euro-fanatical and whether we were meeting the Madrid criteria. That is a de minimis matter. The absolute bar and restrictions which operate in certain areas of the investment and savings industry on the continent constitute a more substantial restriction on the flow of funds. The noble Lord Joseph made the same point in his article, to which the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed referred.

I hope that I have covered most of the issues raised in the debate. I shall not detain the House longer at this late hour.

Mr. Bermingham: Like the beggar who comes to the club of professionals and asks the question to which he never gets an answer, I wonder whether the Financial Secretary will be kind enough to answer a simple question. Are he and the Government committed to retaining or to getting rid of capital gains tax?

Mr. Lilley: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman for not responding to the question that he elaborated in his speech. We have no current plans to get rid of capital gains tax. We reformed it in the 1988 Budget, aligning the capital gains tax rate with income tax. For the majority of people, that had the effect of reducing the capital gains tax rate that they faced—previously it was 30 per cent. and now it is 25 per cent. It may come as a surprise to hon. Members to learn that the majority of people in Britain pay tax at the basic rate—rather than at the higher rate, as most hon. Members do—but that is the case and the majority of those paying capital gains tax are basic rate payers, not higher rate payers. The higher rate payers pay large amounts of capital gains tax. The Treasury is happy to relieve them of those sums and has good use to put them to.

Question put and negatived.

North Tayside (Flooding)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kenneth Carlisle.]

10.10 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On Sunday night of 4 February and on Monday 5 February the River Tay burst its banks in a number of places and severe flooding occurred on a scale not previously experienced this century. That was hardly surprising because on 3 February the River Tay was already flowing at record levels—three times the normal February levels.

Following weeks of precipitation and with the ground saturation at record levels, the intense rainfall and the melting snow of 4 and 5 February produced a massive run-off of water from the catchments of the central and southern highlands, all of which went into loch and river systems which were already well above their normal levels for the time of year.

I remind my hon. Friend the Minister that the River Tay, the longest river, has a flow of water far greater than any other United Kingdom river. Evidence from the Tay river purification board shows that the River Tummel had a flow going through the Pitlochry dam which was the largest ever recorded. That flow reached its peak of 90 cumecs at 1.30 am on 5 February, the Hydro Board reported that about 75 per cent. of that flow originated in the River Garry catchment. The board has no control of flows in the River Garry.

On the River Tay at Grandtully the peak flow of 683 cumecs was reached at 3 am on 5 February. Below Logierait the combined rivers of the Tay, Tummel and Garry produced an immense volume of water—about 1,500-plus cumecs.

The railway line was subjected to all the force of that immense volume of water and, not surprisingly, the line was washed away, as was much of the top soil in the adjacent farms. At least five breaches occurred in that area and a huge washout hole was created.

Two tenanted farms are facing a bill of £32,000 just to clear the fields of sand and stone, and that does not include repairs to flood banks. At other farms and private dwellings in the area the damage to the flood banks and the environment was substantial.

It is essential that an independent hydraulic inquiry be set up, particularly to look into the main causes of the flooding and to get rid of some of the myths that have been circulating about who is to blame.

Afforestation and the Hydro Board are frequently given as the cause. Unless the truth is ascertained, those accusations—the myths—may just stick. In the area of the Dalguise railway viaduct, and downstream of Caputh, the damage calls for a report to define where future flood waters should go.

If the banks of the River Tay had not been breached in those and other areas, Perth city centre would have been flooded. The new flood warning scheme proposed by the Tay river purification board is to be welcomed, as is the Government's support for the scheme. However, warnings or not, the flood water must go somewhere, and only an in-depth hydraulic inquiry can produce viable proposals about where future flood waters should go. The people of Perthshire are looking to the Government to restore the environment and to provide sensible, viable solutions to the risks that a similar future flood may bring.

[Mr. Bill Walker]

The Victoria bridge at Caputh was subjected to massive pressure when the river flow reached its peak of more than 1,700 cumecs at 7.15 am on Monday 5 February. My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that I have a meeting arranged with him for Friday morning when I shall lead a delegation from the Tayside region to talk about the bridge.

In the area below Caputh, major breaches in the flood banks occurred. That was before the peak flow at about 3 am. A large area of land in the vicinity of Spittalfield, Meikleour, Kercock and Braecock was flooded to a considerable depth. A new river course was created in the area, and topsoil was washed away up to a depth of between 10 and 12 ft. Raspberry Fields vanished, and a new deep loch was created between Braecock and Meikleour. The village of Spittalfield was within inches of being completely flooded. The new loch probably saved Perth city centre from severe flooding. It delayed the peak measurement of 1,750 cumecs downstream at Ballathie. That was the greatest flow recorded at Ballathie since the station was opened in 1953.

Throughout the upper Tay system and down to Ballathie, the flood of 4 and 5 February 1990 surpassed any previously recorded in the gauging station's records. Expensive new bungalows at Little Dunkeld were flooded to a depth of 10 to 12 ft. Many old Victorian buildings were flooded for the first time. The police and emergency services performed magnificently. A pregnant woman was lifted by helicopter from the Delvine estate and taken to hospital; cattle were also airlifted out by helicopter. I was astonished that none of that was reported in the national news.

Many individuals and livestock were rescued by boat, and the Glenlyon road was washed away, as was the railway line north of Dunkeld, and the village of Dalguise was flooded. The Tay river purification board, the National Farmers Union and the Scottish Office all responded quickly and positively. A Scottish Office Minister—the noble Lord Sanderson—and I made an early visit to the area.

I wish to pay special thanks to the Tayside police, who did a magnificent job. However, sadly, the Tayside regional council, which is responsible for emergency planning and which was requested by Lord Sanderson to call a meeting to discuss the problem, has still not held the meeting, although more than two months have elapsed since the floods. In my view, because the floods and environmental damage were in rural Perthshire, the Labour administration of the Tayside region was not bothered, and is still not bothered. It is clear that it does not care. It would have been different had the floods been in Dundee, and of course it is just possible that they could have been in Dundee if they had not been in my constituency.

The standards and specifications laid down by the SDD for river flood bank repairs are unrealistic. The use of clay-based material for the repair of banks involves the transport of the clay from a long distance away as there is no local adequate source. Transport costs make that requirement unrealistic. The repair also has to be fully turfed and finally netted, all of which makes the cost of repair considerable. Consequently, many farmers and landowners have decided to replace their respective flood banks in the former traditional manner which the Department used when much of the flooded farmland was in its ownership. Consequently, because the farmers and landowners are pursuing that course, the claims for grant aid will not be made. That is not satisfactory. It cannot be what my noble Friend the Minister of State envisaged or intended when he announced that he was instructing his officials to be flexible and helpful. That all makes nonsense of the Government's wish to be seen to be acting positively and sympathetically towards the victims of the flood.

As the Department has made no contact with Perth college and its advisers, John Dakers and Alex Taylor, who regularly give advice to farmers and landowners on such matters as flood banks, it appears that the Government's good intentions are being frustrated by their own officials, who made a very bad impression at the meeting called by the Perth National Farmers Union on 10 February in Birnam.

It is essential that the Government look urgently at means of restoring the environmental damage. It is right that we should restore damage created by man, whether by coal mines, old steel works or any other form of environmental damage. We should also restore environmental damage caused by nature. I hope that the Government will join me in pressing the EEC to allocate funds for that project and will be prepared to put up adequate funds to restore the badly damaged areas which will require huge quantities of top soil and adequate flood barriers.

I remind my hon. Friend that the banks are not looking kindly on requests for loans to restore the land to its original state. I shall let my hon. Friend have details of the likely cost of the environmental restoration.

I recommend that no new bailey bridge should be erected over the River Tay, for extracting pyrites or other purposes, until the independent hydrology report has been presented. Until we know what caused the flood and the damage, it would be unwise to erect any structure across the Tay. My hon. Friend will be aware that the Tay was washed away during the floods.

I also recommend that a single body be made responsible for flood prevention schemes throughout the river and that the Tayside region be instructed to act positively and constructively and be required to operate with Tay river purification board, which did such a splendid job. I recommend the chief executive and the chairman for the positive and responsible way in which they acted. The council should be instructed to co-operate with the Hydro Board, the NFU committee established to watch over the river and with British Rail, all of which have an interest in what has happened. An urgent review should be made of the demands being made by SDD officials before grants are awarded for river flood bank repairs.

This has been a serious and traumatic experience for many of my constituents, and we are grateful and thankful for the Government's positive and quick response. I hope that they will not now be frustrated by the actions of their own officials and by the inaction of Tayside regional council.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): I am glad to respond to my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and I congratulate him warmly on having secured this debate on the Adjournment on behalf of his constituents.

I join my hon. Friend in paying tribute to the emergency services, which acted speedily. There was considerable damage. For example, the village of Spittalfield, being one of two main outflows from a large flood bank breach at Braecock farm, Caputh, appeared to be threatened by a cross-country torrent of flood water. After an emergency meeting of interested parties at Spittalfield on 7 February, Tayside roads department deposited a considerable amount of material at Braecock, which successfully diverted the Spittalfield flood flow into the other main flood channel.

I assure my hon. Friend that the Government have every sympathy for those affected by the flooding early in February. I know that rivers burst their channels with much force and quickly inundated large tracts of land. My hon. Friend knows that my colleagues and I have kept closely in touch with what is happening about the flooding in north Tayside and elsewhere. Not only have we had regular and frequent reports from our officials, but the Minister of State visited the worst affected areas in the immediate aftermath of the floods in the company of my hon. Friend to see the damage at first hand and to talk to councillors, farmers and local residents about the problems confronting them in restoring things to normal.

Scottish Office officials have been active in the area and have maintained contact with Tayside regional council, the National Farmers Union for Scotland and individual farmers. My hon. Friend has written on behalf of many of his constituents. From all those wide-ranging contacts, we have been kept well informed of the losses and damage suffered by the people in north Tayside, and by the farming community in particular.

Without doubt, the rainfall and river levels experienced in February and March were quite exceptional. The most important thing that can be done for farm land is to ensure that flood defences are restored to good order to prevent further damage. For that reason, the Scottish Office moved swiftly to make special assistance available for the repair of elevated farm flood banks. For a temporary period, grant rates are being increased to 75 per cent. in less favoured areas and 60 per cent. elsewhere, from the normal rates of 50 per cent. and 40 per cent. respectively. Those are the same arrangements as were made last year, which proved effective in securing comprehensive, good quality repairs. The prompt announcement of those special arrangements was widely welcomed. If taken up in full, the total amount of grant will be some £600,000 in Scotland; I announce that figure for the first time.

My hon. Friend will be interested to know that 29 applications from his constituency have been made for approval of proposed repair work to damaged flood banks. Engineering specifications have been provided by specialists in the Scottish Office in almost all those cases, enabling the farmers concerned to obtain estimates from the contractors.

There is also assistance for the non-agricultural sector. The scheme of financial assistance to local authorities—the Bellwin scheme—was triggered by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State on 8 February. It has been reviewed because of the abolition of domestic rates and their replacement by the community charge on 1 April. The main change is that the threshold above which grant will be paid is now expressed as a flat rate per community charge payer, and in all cases this results in lower thresholds than before. The level of grant above the threshold is also increased from 75 per cent. to 85 per cent. Claims are still awaited from local authorities, which have until 31 July to make their applications. The Scottish Office has recently sent out a circular to local authorities which brings together the various sources of central Government funding available to offset expenditure arising from an emergency.

I am glad to confirm that the Scottish Office has endorsed proposals by the Tay river purification board to install a flood warning system and has adjusted the board's borrowing consent to permit the necessary expenditure to be incurred this year. I feel sure that the board will welcome that.

My hon. Friend has correctly focused on the need for a co-ordinated approach to water management problems in Tayside. It is true that the number of interests is large and, individually, their views may not always be compatible. My hon. Friend has called for a public inquiry. I entirely agree with him on the point of principle. We need to look beyond individual cases and beyond immediate questions of repair and restoration. If we thought that a public inquiry was the right way to look into those wider issues, we should hold one, but there is a mechanism to hand which we think is more appropriate.

Under the Flood Prevention (Scotland) Act 1961, Tayside regional council is the flood prevention authority for non-agricultural land. It also has powers under local government legislation to take measures to safeguard life and property and to incur expenditure where an emergency or disaster threatens or has occurred. Accordingly, my noble Friend the Minister of State suggested to Tayside regional council that it was best placed to invite parties to meet to identify the various viewpoints, to discuss how problems should be addressed and, no doubt, to form a working group. I am sure this is the correct way forward. It follows the pattern set in the Highland region following flooding last year, and I am confident that it will achieve my hon. Friend's objective.

The council has agreed to do this and has already said that an independent study by experts in hydrology—my hon. Friend called for such a study—should be commissioned to examine the feasibility of river management measures for flood alleviation. The council has asked for assistance towards the cost of such a study and my noble Friend the Minister of State will write to the council soon with an offer of a financial contribution up to a maximum of £10,000.

I should like to turn to some of the specific issues which have arisen. I am well aware that there was a quite prolonged period when wet ground and high river levels prevented heavy plant and machinery from gaining access to the floodbank breaches. Working conditions have improved dramatically in the past few weeks and I would urge farmers to press ahead with repairs and to take advantage of the enhanced grants. Other assistance is also available which would be of help to farmers suffering from the after-effects of the flood. Arterial drainage grants provide help with restoring eroded river banks or clearing blocked drainage ditches, and the European Community element of the farm and conservation grant scheme provides assistance towards replacing fences and the reseeding of grassland.

We have helped in a variety of other ways, too. Officials have been instructed to operate the grant schemes and other schemes with the maximum flexibility that the rules will allow. Farmers who are already following fixed plans will be given greater freedom than is usual to change these so as to take account of flood damage. Farmers who wish to enter the set-aside scheme but who had missed the application deadline are being allowed to make late applications.

I well understand the anxiety of some farmers who think that the deadline of 31 August for floodbank claims is too tight and that the engineering specifications are too demanding. On the first of these, it is essential to establish the repairs so that they can resist erosion when high waters next return, which could be as soon as September with the Tay. As to the standards required, my hon. Friend must recognise that these must be closely related to the threat of attack by flood water, which will vary from place to place. It could jeopardise investment if standards were insufficient for the purpose. My hon. Friend will wish to note—I emphasise this point because he was concerned about it—that officials of the Scottish Office would be happy to discuss individual cases on their merits with farmers. The officials gave me that undertaking.

I am very much aware that floodbank grants of 75 per cent. or 60 per cent. still leave individuals to find the remainder. Since floodbank repairs are costly, some may find difficulty raising their share, but I cannot agree that the Government contribution should be raised to 100 per cent. as has been suggested. For the Government to do that would be to take over responsibility for protecting private property. Responsibility for agricultural land lies with riparian landowners, and it is right and proper that they should contribute on an individual basis. As I have already pointed out, the same arrangements were effective elsewhere last year and it would be most unfair to the other farmers to make a further exception now.

We have also looked at the costs of land restoration. They can be, as my hon. Friend knows from estimates that he has seen, nearly £40,000 per acre. Prime agricultural land in north Tayside is valued at about £1,000 per acre. Restoration at those prices would not be a good investment for a landowner, or the taxpayer, on cost-benefit grounds.

My hon. Friend referred to the damage to agricultural land and called for assistance, on environmental grounds, for its restoration. However, the latest reports that I have had suggest that even the worst-hit farms made a remarkable recovery in the favourable weather of April and early May. Cropping has resumed in all but isolated pockets on individual farms. I have to say that this is a tribute to the skill, hard work and dedication of the farmers who are my hon. Friend's constituents in the area. In some cases, the deposit of silt will actually provide a fertility bonus in the longer term.

However, in one or two cases, areas were totally scoured out, or cut off so dramatically that they can no longer serve any useful agricultural purpose. Some areas may have to be written off. Land restoration is excluded from the farm and conservation grant scheme. To qualify for the environmentally sensitive areas scheme, land must be within an area specially designated for the purpose. The seriously damaged cases in question are not in such a designated area. The Nature Conservancy Council and the Countryside Commission for Scotland, which have small grant budgets in any case, could not apply their funds for the purpose of restoring agricultural production.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): Will the Minister give way?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No. I have a great deal to say in the two minutes that remain.

The Scottish Development Agency's arrangements for derelict land are for the purpose of recovery from industrial dereliction created by man. There are no powers, therefore, which would clearly apply for the purpose of restoring these areas of land.

The hope has been expressed that assistance might be obtained from EC funds. The provisions of EC regulation 4256/88, which governs assistance from the Community's agriculture funds to help areas recover agricultural production after a natural disaster, do not apply to north Tayside. It does not fall within the specially designated areas which qualify for such aid, which are Northern Ireland, the Highlands and Islands development board area and parts of Dumfries and Galloway. So assistance for Tayside from this source would not qualify under the agriculture fund. Nor can I hold out any hope of assistance from the funds made available to the United Kingdom as emergency aid. Those funds are entirely at the Commission's discretion and are given primarily as a humanitarian gesture.

I hope that my hon. Friend is ready to acknowledge that the Government have responded sympathetically to the difficulties of his constituents. We are making generous grants available for floodbank repairs with a public sector contribution which could run to more than £600,000 in Scotland, more than half of which would be available to farmers, in north Tayside in my hon. Friend's constituency. That is a reasonable offer to farmers, and I hope that they will take full advantage of it.

We shall also contribute up to £10,000 towards the cost of the independent study by consultant hydrologists, which Tayside regional council proposes to commission. We responded promptly and positively to the Tay river purification board's proposals for a flood warning system, and, of course, I have described the improvements in the Bellwin arrangements. All in all, I suggest to my hon. Friend, that the Government have taken rapid and measured action both to help deal with the immediate emergency and to have the longer-term issues properly

I congratulate my hon. Friend again most warmly on bringing this subject to the attention of the House. It has provided an opportunity to state clearly the terms of the circular sent out to local authorities on what is being done in Scotland. I shall read with utmost care what has been said and respond to him more fully if any details have not been covered in this brief debate. I thank him again.

Mr. Home Robertson: I am sorry that the Minister could not give way to me. I simply wish to associate the Opposition with the anxiety expressed by the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) about the disaster that affected his constituency. I am a little disappointed by the Government's piecemeal approach, which the Minister outlined. There seems to be a case for some co-ordinating unit at the Scottish Office to help to draw together advice, practical assistance and financial support in order to overcome this type of natural disaster wherever it may strike. As I said, I am sorry that the Minister could not give way to me. I simply wished to say that I shared the anxiety of the hon. Member for Tayside, North.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am glad to respond to the hon. Gentleman's point. I thank him for associating himself with the pleas of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North. We believe that the way forward for Tayside regional council is to establish a working group. That suggestion has been made. It has worked well in the Highland region. Often, things are not best organised in detail from the centre. The people on the spot who are responsible for the emergency services have to play a key role. My hon. Friend appreciates that and has paid tribute to those people. I thank him again for having given the House the opportunity to consider the matter today.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Pigs

1. Mr. Donald Thompson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what factors affect monetary compensatory amounts on pigs.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Gummer): The 9·8 per cent. devaluation in the pigmeat green rate that we obtained for the United Kingdom at the price fixing will, at current rates of exchange, eliminate our pigmeat MCAs.

Mr. Thompson: I am sure that my right hon. Friend will accept the thanks of the industry for that. Will he take this opportunity to thank the pig industry for its fight against Aujesky's disease and the way in which it has funded the fight with such successful results?

Mr. Gummer: I am pleased to confirm that. I think that I was the first Member to raise the question of Aujesky's disease in the House in the first year of this Government. I am pleased that I am the Minister who will probably be the first to say that the disease is finally removed from Britain.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: Why did the Minister fail to take the first opportunity to alert the public to the problems arising from feed contaminated with cyanide being fed to pigs in Yorkshire, which resulted in the slaughter of more than 1,200 pigs? Is not that another example of the secrecy and cover-up tactics adopted by this Minister, which have led to such a lack of trust in his Ministry?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Lady should not suggest that there has been a cover-up. If ever a Ministry announced everything and gave all the information, it is this Ministry. She makes that suggestion because she does not know the facts. She does not know that the French feed was discovered and that Bibby's did the work necessary to withdraw it, or that it presented no public health hazard whatever. She should stand up and congratulate my officials who did the work, rather than insult them.

Mr. Hunter: Bearing in mind the fact that the cyclical nature of the pig industry reflects the size of the national herd, does my right hon. Friend think that it is desirable to introduce greater stability through a tighter EEC regime, or that that area of agriculture is better left more open to market forces?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is right to say that we must be particularly generous in eliminating the MCAs for the pig industry because it has so little support under the present common agricultural policy. In the end, the British industry will do much better if it can regain a large proportion of our home market, which has been taken over by competitors.

Mr. Morley: Further to the question of my hon. Friend the Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor), it appears that on 3 May the Minister was aware that pig feed was contaminated with a cyanate product, Cyanox 425, as well as the insecticide Isofenphos, yet it was not until 9 May, through parliamentary questions from my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark), that the information was made known. When the Minister goes round the country making silly speeches about such matters as vegetarianism being an unnatural activity, while suppressing important information on contamination of pigmeat in Yorkshire, Humberside, Durham and Nottinghamshire, is not his personal credibility damaged in dealing with public anxiety about food safety?

Mr. Gummer: What the hon. Gentleman says would be true if it were right. The press was fully informed of that matter long before the question was raised in the House. It recognised that as there was no threat whatever to human health, it was not even worth putting into the press. It is not surprising that no one but the hon. Gentleman seems to think that it is a matter of secrecy. It can hardly be secret if the press has been told.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Will the Minister remind the Opposition that cabbage contains cyanide and that it is a natural part of the human diet, although that may worry vegetarians? Will he also remind the Opposition that scare stories about food are quite unwarranted? We have some of the safest food in the world.

Mr. Gummer: I have to admit to my hon. Friend that I have not advised the public about the cyanide that is in cabbage. If the press feels that it would like to take that up, no doubt we can discuss it. I keep nothing from the public and I am prepared always to tell the public the truth. It is only because the Opposition want to find a conspiracy that they are determined to say that, largely because they have very little else to say about agriculture.

Fishing Industry

2. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the present state of the fishing industry.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): Landings of all species by United Kingdom vessels in the United Kingdom for 1989 were worth some £389 million compared with £396 million in 1988. While fishing opportunities and earnings from North sea cod and haddock in 1990 have been reduced, the estimated value of landings in the early part of the year was at least similar to that at the same time last year.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Minister accept that notwithstanding the figures that he has given for earnings, the industry is still facing depression and is apprehensive? He mentioned the decline in earnings from cod and haddock. Is he aware that many producers are experiencing a squeeze on their catches of whiting? Will he explain to the House why, when the total allowable catches of whiting went up this year, the amount for industrial fishing went up even more, thereby affecting our fleet, which catches fish for human consumption? What steps are the Government taking in current reviews to alter that and to allow more fish to be caught for human consumption? That would help our fleet, which needs every little bit of help that it can get.

Mr. Curry: I draw the hon. Gentleman's attention to the consultation paper called "Entitlement Aggregation". That is the next phase of our management improvement and will be in the Library today. It will tackle some of the problems of the fleet. The hon. Gentleman asked about whiting. It is true that scientists recommended an increase in the industrial catch, which is why the total allowable catches went up. We keep those figures under review, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be glad to know that we are seeking an increase in cod availability because of an agreement with Norway. That increase will be distributed according to the normal rules. We are presently negotiating that with the Community.

Sir Michael Shaw: Has my hon. Friend had a chance to read the thoroughly misleading leaflet being circulated by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell)? Does he agree that there must be agreement between all hon. Members with constituencies adjacent to the North sea if the North sea fishing industry is to be preserved? Does he further agree that the present problem is mainly about the number of fish there? It cannot be solved unilaterally. Will my hon. Friend assure the House that the Government will do everything possible to preserve the long-term interests of the British fishing industry?

Mr. Curry: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell) produced a sort of samizdat. It was written in small print, no doubt to deter people from reading it so that they would not be too bemused. It was an exercise in historical nostalgia and was very selective in its facts. My hon. Friend is right to say that it is only by common effort in conservation and by achieving better management, which the Government have already embarked upon, that we can conserve stocks for the future of the fishing industry.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: Does the Minister accept that even if the print on the document, which many Conservative Members support, was small, the message is still loud and clear? In its present crisis the industry needs a decommissioning scheme as a conservation measure. It needs proper conservation by way of an increase in mesh sizes, a ban on industrial fishing and the use of square mesh panels. Why does not the Minister take the lead in introducing those measures instead of leaving all the running to a Commissioner who seems to do more for his native Spanish industry than for the industry of this country?

Mr. Curry: First, it is nice of the hon. Gentleman to come here. Secondly, we have introduced a series of management measures. I commend the latest paper to the hon. Gentleman and I am sure that his fleet in Grimsby will find it of great interest. We are pursuing the conservation options with a great deal of enthusiasm, together with our Scottish colleagues and the remainder of the United Kingdom.

By a combination of more intelligent and better management measures and effective conservation measures, we shall achieve real benefits for our fleet—rather than taking the hon. Gentleman's purely theoretical and rhetorical stance, which no doubt is in keeping with the media personality that he wishes to pursue.

Mr. Harris: Has my hon. Friend received my letter about the renewed and growing fears of fishermen, especially in Cornwall, about the apparent reappearance of the so-called flags of convenience vessels on the register? He will know that some 136 vessels were removed from our fishing fleet as a result of legislation passed by the House, but now there are fears that 29 such vessels have come back on to our register. Can my hon. Friend enlighten us on that?

Mr. Curry: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend some information. The vessels that are now back on the register are under British ownership, with a single exception that is Spanish owned. They all fulfil the requirement for management of their fisheries from a United Kingdom economic base. They also fulfil the domiciliary and residence requirements. To all intents and purposes, those vessels are no longer quota hoppers; they are legal under British registration and licensing procedures.

Mr. McGrady: Is the Minister aware of the grave concern of the Northern Ireland Fish Producers Organisation about the proposal to change the navigational system for fishing in the Irish sea from the well-tried Decca method to an obsolete air system that has been abandoned by the United States? Will he undertake to consult the Northern Ireland Fish Producers Organisation and respond reasonably to its concerns about its members' livelihoods? In the aftermath of a very bad winter, it wants to ensure that the capability to fish will be safeguarded.

Mr. Curry: The substance of the matter is more for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport. However, my Department has taken an interest in it and we hope to obtain a significant cut in the light dues paid by fishermen. We have managed to achieve a long transition period, which I believe will be very useful to the industry. I am conscious of the position of the Northern Ireland fishing industry and, in consultation with my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary, who is on the Bench with me, we do our utmost to safeguard the industry's livelihood.

Mr. Mans: What sort of support can the industry on the west coast, especially in my port of Fleetwood, expect from the Government to meet the European Community's hygiene regulations in 1992?

Mr. Curry: As my hon. Friend knows, a series of measures will enable us to support the development of modern hygiene facilities. Of course, a considerable part of that must fall upon the industry because it is important that it can meet the single market and claim that fish is a product that is handled cleanly as well as being exceptionally healthy. We shall do our utmost to ensure that the British fishing industry, which is the largest in the northern part of the European Community, can compete effectively.

Food Labelling

3. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any plans to make further changes to the present regulations covering the labelling of food.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Maclean): There are in various stages of development, both here and in Brussels, proposals covering date marking, lot identification marks, nutrition labelling, quantitive ingredient listing, ingredient listing for alcoholic drinks, controls on claims and the labelling of irradiated food. The Food Advisory Committee is also carrying out a review of food labelling at my request.

Mr. Bruce: Is the Minister aware that concern has been expressed by British-based exporters of meat that they are not on a level playing field? Is he further aware that a company in my constituency recently had a load of pigeon breasts condemned by the Italian authorities on grounds that had not been previously advised—that is, that the labelling was not in Italian, although it had not been requested, and that there was not a full veterinary certificate, even though the company had met all the British requirements? Is the Minister satisfied that other members of the European Community are offering trade on equal terms?

Mr. Maclean: If any of the hon. Gentleman's constituents encounter certification problems on the export of meat or meat products, my officials will be ready to give all the help and advice possible. The hon. Gentleman demonstrates the importance of having a regime for such matters with common standards and well-understood rules throughout Europe, which are enforced equally by all member states, and that is our policy.

Mr. Lord: Now that our egg industry is probably the most carefully controlled and hygienic in the world, will my hon. Friend give further consideration to the possibility of stamping individual eggs, as we used to do with the old British lion? We are all well aware that it is possible to stamp boxes, but boxes marked "Packed in Britain" may be full of imported eggs. Bearing in mind the privations that the egg industry has had to put up with in recent months in order to reach its present position, is not it time to identify individual eggs for the benefit of consumers and egg producers alike?

Mr. Maclean: I partly disagree with my hon. Friend. It is contrary to the rules to stamp individual eggs and the last time that that was done consumers believed that they were not as fresh as unstamped eggs. I commend to my hon. Friend and to the House the excellent campaigns being run by British egg organisations to draw to consumers' attention the benefits of British eggs. I also commend the report of the Select Committee on Agriculture, which made some excellent comments about the quality of British eggs.

Mr. Ron Davies: Does the Minister now regret not having introduced fuller regulations on the labelling of animal feedstuffs? Does he agree that many farmers would not be using many of the feedstuffs that are fed to pigs and poultry, which contain the rendered remains of scrapie-infected sheep and BSE-infected cattle, if they knew the contents? Why does not he introduce a compulsory labelling scheme so that producers know what they are using?

Mr. Maclean: In addition to producers and consumers knowing what they are using, the hon. Gentleman should know what is happening on the European front. In January this year agreement was reached on the draft directive on ingredient listing for animal feedingstuffs. We are negotiating fuller details on animal feedingstuffs, which will apply throughout Europe. It is not possible, and it would be wrong, for me to try to act unilaterally.

Food Safety

4. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has had with regard to the accuracy of statements in the book entitled, "Parents Guide to Safe Food".

Mr. Maclean: I understand that the book has yet to be published. However, references that I have seen in the press suggest that some of the subjects are treated in a misleading and alarmist manner. If that is correct, the publication will be of little help to consumers in reaching a balanced judgment about the food available to them. I hope that it will be more accurate than recent allegations made by Parents for Safe Food regarding residues of pesticides in food.

Mr. King: Does my hon. Friend agree that we suffer from an over-supply of experts on food quality and that it is high time that sensible observations were made about the high quality of British food? We could do with fewer reports based on spurious science and inaccurate information peddled by people masquerading as experts. In most people's eyes an expert on this subject is "ex", a has been, and "spert", a person under pressure.

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend makes a good point. As we are always urged to be as safe as the Americans with regard to pesticides such as Alar, I should tell hon. Members that the American Agriculture Secretary said: "unlike us, the British have decided not to ban EBDCs, because they found there was really no health risk involved. British science is at least as sophisticated as ours. Our government has banned products of significant value to mankind in recent years on the basis of what I consider unpersuasive evidence. We ought not to be doing that." I agree.

Ms. Quin: As the Minister has mentioned pesticides, will he comment on the recent case of the consumer who thought that he had bought organically grown potatoes but found that they had been treated with tecnazine? Consumers surely have a right to know whether the food products that they buy have been treated with pesticides.

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Lady raises two very good points. First, any pesticides used on crops in this country are safe. If they were not, they would not be authorised. Secondly—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I appeal to hon. Members seated below the Gangway, as it seems that I have to do every day lately, not to barrack other right hon. and hon. Members from a sedentary position.

Mr. Maclean: Secondly, of course the consumer has a right not to be conned. If a person thinks that he is buying organic produce, he has a right to be certain that it has been organically grown. We have established the United Kingdom register of organic food producers, and we want to ensure that throughout the EEC, organic labels mean exactly what they say and that there is no cheating. That matter is for the enforcement authorities.

Mr. Boswell: Will my hon. Friend confirm his readiness to consider any objective and scientific evidence that is offered by scare campaigns? Will he equally criticise and treat on their merits any claims unsubstantiated by evidence, or supported by evidence that is unscientific and inadequate?

Mr. Maclean: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. We have an open-door policy, whereby people can come to us with their evidence and views. It is interesting that in the past few weeks, on several occasions when I have called for evidence from the so-called experts who crop up in the media, that evidence has been very slow in coming. In most cases, it has not been presented at all.

Dr. David Clark: Has the Minister seen today's opinion polls, which show, contrary to his assertions, that the majority of British people do not believe that the Government can be trusted "to tell the truth" about food issues? Is not that a scandalous state of affairs? Will the Minister consider abolishing the old-fashioned Agriculture Ministry and replacing it with a modern Ministry of Agriculture and Food, backed up by an independent food standards agency?

Mr. Maclean: It is interesting that the only reform that the hon. Gentleman can suggest is to turn the title of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food into the Ministry of Food, Agriculture and Fisheries. If that is the substance of his policies, no wonder he has proved that Labour, just like its leader, is unfit for government.

Dairy Farmers

6. Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the prospects for dairy farmers' incomes during 1990-91.

Mr. Gummer: Net income from dairying in 1989-90 was estimated to be 75 per cent. higher in real terms than in 1983-84, before the introduction of quotas. This year, the sector will benefit from the substantial devaluation in the green pound and from the shorter intervention payment delays that took effect earlier this week.

Mr. Pawsey: I thank my right hon. Friend for his extremely helpful reply, which will be widely welcomed by farmers not only in my constituency but throughout the country. Does he expect that the improvement will continue, and what does he think are the industry's long-term prospects?

Mr. Gummer: Many of the factors behind the improvement are continuing. I hope that the dairying industry will take seriously the new challenges of 1992 and of the single market, seek to be more competitive than ever against our European partners, and look to the type of structure that will most help to ensure that.

Mr. Home Robertson: In his calculation of the prospects for dairy farmers' incomes in the coming year, has the Minister taken any account of the certain consequences of his step-by-step resistance to the imposition of effective measures to control the menace of bovine spongiform encephalopathy, including the suggestions put forward by the National Farmers Union? Will he accept that he is meant to be responsible for food as well as agriculture and that his imitation of Corporal Jones running around saying, "Don't panic", is not good enough? Can we have some action to restore confidence in the meat and dairy industry?

Mr. Gummer: If what the hon. Gentleman suggested —step-by-step resistance—was the case he might have some basis for his argument, but the farmers are being protected by the consumer interest of my Ministry, which puts the consumer first and is therefore able to say categorically, in the words of the chief medical officer, that

"British beef is entirely safe to eat".

Farmers know that by putting the consumer first I ensure that their future is safeguarded. The people that farmers and consumers are looking askance at are people such as the hon. Gentleman who seek to spread scandal and fear when it is not necessary.

Scottish Fishing Industry

8. Mr. Andrew Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next expects to meet representatives of the Scottish fishing industry to discuss catches.

Mr. Curry: I met Scottish fishermen's representatives at the recent Glasgow fishing exhibition and my noble Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, regularly meets them.

Mr. Welsh: Is the Minister aware that in the past month in my constituency two fishing boats have been sold and another five boats are nearly on the market as the effects of the Government's failure ripple through the industry? Is he aware that I am not talking about big corporations but about small businesses and individuals who are now caught up in the worst of all possible economic worlds? They cannot catch enough fish to run their boats, but they are left with assets which cannot easily be converted. The Government have betrayed the fishing industry. The hon. Gentleman is in charge—what is he going to do about it?

Mr. Curry: That is a load of—[HON. MEMBERS: "Say it."] I was seeking a suitable expression. That is rubbish. The hon. Gentleman cannot expect any Government to guarantee the continued existence in its present shape of any industry in this country. He can, however, expect the Government to ensure that the industry's management is effective and ask the industry to be serious about conservation measures. We have improved management and we are seriously pursuing conservation measures, but we do not intend or claim that we can maintain the industry in its present state. The rationalisation of the industry is necessary, as it recognises.

Mr. Bill Walker: Does my hon. Friend agree that one of the great problems is the structure of the industry and that the bulk of the catch in Scotland is brought in by large vessels? Small vessels catch only a small proportion of the total catch. It would be extremely difficult for any scheme to benefit those who make such a small contribution to the total catch.

Mr. Curry: As I am sure that my hon. Friend knows, very small vessels are not subject to the licensing and quota arrangements. They remain outside the management system. We are concerned about the future of small fishermen. That is why we are introducing measures that will enable the fleet to rationalise sensibly through a combination of market forces and Government assistance which still represents one of the greatest financial commitments in any industry in this country in comparison with the industry's turnover.

Mr. Foulkes: Will the Minister confirm that he has had representations from fishermen on the west coast of Scotland about fishermen from the east coast who are forced to come round to the west because of restrictions imposed by the haddock quotas? Will he consider the proposal that west coast fishermen have put forward to introduce local fishing plans to protect their interests and to make prawns a pressure stock?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman knows that a consultation paper has been published on the west coast problem. We have received representations from the industry. The Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food are considering those representations. If we think that further management measures on the west coast are necessary and that they will not penalise efficient fishing methods and add a new layer of bureaucracy for fishermen to cope with, we shall consider them seriously. We recognise that there is a problem.

Mr. Michael Brown: When my hon. Friend meets Scottish fishermen, will he draw to their attention the view expressed to the three Members of Parliament for south Humberside last Friday when we met English fishing industry representatives from Hull and Grimsby? They felt that Scottish fishermen were getting a far better deal at the expense of English fishermen, which underlines exactly the point that my hon. Friend made earlier.

Mr. Curry: I regularly meet representatives of the English fishing industry and, indeed, the whole United Kingdom fishing industry. I have never felt that they are short of words and I am sure that they are capable of expressing those sentiments to Scottish fishermen.

Mr. Robert Hughes: As the Minister has acknowledged that the fishing industry is going through perilous times and that drastic and painful restructuring is needed, with which the industry is prepared to co-operate, why does he continue to set his face against the decommissioning scheme and the temporary lay-off scheme so that restructuring could be carried out sensibly and the people concerned receive proper compensation? Do we have to invent mad fish disease before he is prepared to give the matter his attention?

Mr. Curry: If the hon. Gentleman wants a sensible restructuring of the industry, a decommissioning scheme is just about the last way to go about it. Capacity would not necessarily be reduced and people would not necessarily leave the fishing fleet as we should like. It would be a very expensive option. It would be much more sensible to pursue a twin course. First, we must give fishermen the right to make their own decisions. I recommend to the hon. Gentleman the licensing aggregation proposals. Secondly, we must pursue the adoption of conservation measures at the European level. We shall pursue those courses and they will result in an efficient, well-structured British fleet which is competitive on a European scale.

Emergency Orders

9. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received concerning the incurring of non-recoverable losses by farmers due to the implementation of emergency orders.

Mr. Maclean: I have received representations from a number of sources—including, both directly and indirectly, the National Farmers Union, the Country Landowners Association and food industry interests.

Mr. Coombs: I accept the need for emergency Government powers, where appropriate, to protect food safety, but will my hon. Friend confirm that many of the farmers covered by these powers were found subsequently not to be affected by contamination and were unable to recover their losses? Will my hon. Friend look carefully, sympathetically and urgently at introducing legislation to try to rectify that problem?

Mr. Maclean: We always look carefully at the effects of any of the orders or decisions that we take. If my hon. Friend is referring to the recent problem of lead in feed in the west country, he will be aware that the Government's first priority is to protect public health. We had to act on information received from the feed companies. The farmer's first recourse must be to the perpetrators of the incident—those who supplied them with the feed, and their suppliers. That is where the liability for error lies.

Mr. Wilson: Does the Minister accept that his bumptious music hall turn performance at the Dispatch Box today is an insult to the public, who are seriously worried about food safety issues? Will he at last come to the Dispatch Box and speak for consumers instead of acting as a mouthpiece for the British food industry? Does he not understand that by talking so much rubbish in defence of vested interests, and by promoting the eating of rubbish, he is doing damage to the health of this country's population?

Mr. Maclean: It was nice today during food questions to come across an example of one of the things that we have been facing this week—the nonsense that we have heard from Opposition spokesmen. The hon. Gentleman has demonstrated that he has been going around as has his hon. Friend the Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), like a demented Private Fraser from "Dad's Army" saying, "We're all doomed." It is a doomsday scenario. That is the kind of rubbish and nonsense that we are hearing from Opposition Members. The hon. Gentleman is wrong, just as his hon. Friends have been wrong all week. I chair the consumer panel, I meet consumers who come into my office and I represent consumer interests.

Agricultural Development Advisory Service

10. Mr. Marland: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the head of the Agricultural Development Advisory Service to discuss the future of the Agricultural Development Advisory Service.

Mr. Gummer: I regularly meet the director general of the Agricultural Development and Advisory Service to discuss a range of matters including organisational issues.

Mr. Marland: My right hon. Friend will be aware that there is considerable disquiet in the agricultural industry about the future of ADAS. Will he undertake to discuss any major moves with the chairmen of the regional panels?

Mr. Gummer: ADAS is always a matter of discussion in our meetings with the regional panels. I assure my hon. Friend that I will continue those discussions. We are pleased with the way in which ADAS has started to respond to the increase in its charging facilities and with the effect that it is having on the agriculture industry.

Mr. Tony Banks: When the Secretary of State met the head of the advisory service, did he by any chance discuss the growing of vegetables? Is he aware how offensive his recent remarks were when he suggested that people who were vegetarian were somehow indulging in unnatural practices and acting against the word of the Lord, or words to that effect? May we assume that those words were bovine spongiform-induced? Does the Secretary of State intend to put a health warning on carrots, telling people that they may be damning their eternal souls if they eat them, or does he intend to apologise to the House and in particular to Mr. Speaker who is a well-known vegetarian?

Mr. Gummer: Mr. Speaker, you and I have corresponded to some end on that matter, and I repeat what I said to you—that I eat vegetables with great pleasure. I object only to those people who say that I should be a vegetarian. I do not want to make them carnivorous, although man does appear naturally so to be.

Green Pound

11. Mr. Speller: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further actions he intends to take to help British agriculture while the green pound remains in existence.

Mr. Gummer: The Government are committed to ending disparities between green and market rates of exchange of the pound by the end of 1992 at the latest. To achieve that, we shall be seeking further substantial devaluations of the green pound between now and then.

Mr. Speller: I thank my right hon. Friend for his hard work and the success that he achieved recently at the Commission. May I also remind him of another way in which he could help? Last July we lost an appeal with the Commission to extend the less-favoured areas. If that appeal could be pushed forward so that we get a reply in under 12 months, it would be a great help to the farming community in areas such as my constituency.

Mr. Gummer: I assure my hon. Friend that we are seeking to ensure that that review is completed as soon as possible. We are constantly pressing the Commission for the result.

Mr. Maclennan: Does the Minister accept that, as the Prime Minister has pointed out, the underlying rate of inflation in Britain is within a percentage point of that in Europe, so the case for remaining outside the exchange rate mechanism has exploded? Does he recognise that British agriculture will be tremendously assisted by immediate entry in to the ERM?

Mr. Gummer: The Government are committed to joining the ERM at the time when it is right for us to do so. British agriculture would be harmed considerably if we chose the wrong moment. The hon. Gentleman will know that my European credentials are clear, but I do not wish to damage the British agricultural industry merely to follow the course of action that the hon. Gentleman wishes at a time when it would not be helpful.

Food Prices

12. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the movement in food prices in the last five years; what was the equivalent movement between 1974 and 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Over the past five years the annual increase in food prices has been 4·4 per cent. That compares with an increase of 16·5 per cent. per year between 1974 and 1979.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend underline again and again and again that food prices rise much faster under Labour Governments than ever they do under Conservative Governments? Will he use the present favourable conditions to phase out battery farming and intensive farming wherever possible? Above all, will he let the housewives know that a Labour Government would cost them a fortune?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is right. The Labour party has spent most of this afternoon pretending to be the friend of the consumer, but any Government who presided over rising food prices of that order are the enemy of every consumer in the country.

Royal Society for the Protection of Birds

14. Dr. Kim Howells: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds to discuss matters within its responsibilities.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have commissioned extensive research—[Interruption.] I am sorry—I should be answering question No. 14. My noble Friend the Minister of State, Baroness Trumpington, met the RSPB on 14 May 1990.

Dr. Howells: When the Minister next meets the director of the RSPB, will he discuss with him the wholesale slaughter of wild birds on the hillsides of mid-Glamorgan as a result of fires sweeping across that area, usually deliberately started by teenagers? There have been at least 1,400 such fires in the past two months. They are endangering people living in the valleys, who are left unattended by fire engines which are stuck up on the mountain dealing with the fires. Will the Minister discuss that and the effect that it is having on wildlife in the area?

Mr. Maclean: I can give the hon. Gentleman the assurance that he seeks. The whole House will deplore anyone deliberately starting fires—whether in urban, rural or hillside areas—endangering, I presume, not only wildlife but human life. We at the Ministry will use our best endeavours to draw the problem to the attention of all concerned and hope that it will be stamped out as soon as possible.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Hayward: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 May.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings today, including one with President Mubarak of Egypt.

Mr. Hayward: Does my right hon. Friend regret the rise in unemployment announced earlier today as it is an indication of an increase in unit labour costs? Has she noticed, however, that in the regions of the north and the midlands, and in Scotland and Wales, unemployment has continued to fall?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I agree with my hon. Friend. The seasonally adjusted figure has risen by just over 1,000, although the headline total is down by 20,000. As my hon. Friend knows, unemployment has fallen by some 250,000 in the last year and we still have more people in jobs than ever before, but there is a danger about unit labour costs rising—if they continue to rise more than those of our competitors, we shall see unemployment rising. I notice that in this country last year unit labour costs rose by 5 per cent. while in the Federal Republic of Germany and in Japan they stayed absolutely static, in the United States they rose by only 2 per cent., and in France they actually fell by 2 per cent. That is a measure of the task that we have to face.

Mr. Kinnock: May I take this opportunity of telling the Prime Minister that the whole House is united in its condemnation of the terrorist bombings this week and that the whole House will want to offer condolences to the family of Sergeant Chapman, who was murdered yesterday, and to all who have been injured? May I also say once again that no Government formed from either side of this House will ever concede to violence?

The Prime Minister: I agree very much with the right hon. Gentleman that the vicious and sick minds that plan and execute these attacks bring shame and discredit on themselves and their cause and on all who associate with and support them. The fact is that they all have a full democratic vote which they can exercise in just the same way as anyone else. Because they do not like the result, they try to bomb and maim people out of it. We cannot tolerate that and we must and will do all in our power to fight these terrible and brutal attacks—and to restore order once again and full democracy to Northern Ireland —and of course, here, where they are now trying to pursue their deadly attacks.

Q2. Mr. Moate: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Moate: Does my right hon. Friend agree that we should be wise to listen carefully to the words of the Leader of the Opposition when he talks about credit controls? After all, did not the previous Labour Government have extensive experience of using credit controls, exchange controls, devaluation and high interest rates? Yet they still managed to achieve inflation of almost 27 per cent. We do not need to look into the crystal ball when we can look at the book.

The Prime Minister: I agree with my hon. Friend that in the modern economy, with the amount of freedom that we now have, credit controls will not work. A former Treasury Minister, the right hon. Member for Llanelli (Mr. Davies), had it right when he said:

"The Labour Party idea that you can have credit controls is rubbish. There is no way you can control credit except by controlling the price of credit, and the price of credit is bank rate."

Q3. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Mullin: Has the Prime Minister read the speech by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry in Tokyo on Monday, in which he boasted that Britain had some of the cheapest unit labour costs in western Europe? Does she agree that whatever the cause for today's rise in unemployment it can therefore have nothing to do with wages?

The Prime Minister: I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) the latest figures from last year. Unfortunately, our unit labour costs are now rising faster than those of many of our competitors and that is serious. In Japan and in Germany, unit labour costs have not risen at all. In the United States they have risen by 2 per cent., in France they have fallen by 2 per cent., and in this country they have risen by 5 per cent. That means that we are taking out more pay than we are putting back in productivity. That can only have a damaging effect on jobs in the future.

Sir Ian Lloyd: Does my right hon. Friend consider that it is feasible, desirable or in the public interest that, in effect, the motor vehicle should be used as an instrument for enforcing total prohibition on the roads? If not, does she agree that as the most modern, accurate and sophisticated technology is now available to enable the motorist to ensure that he or she does not approach the limit, it should be used in the same way as the motorist uses the speedometer? If my right hon. Friend is with me thus far, will she encourage the Home Office to abandon its ancient policy of proceeding in front of all new technology at 4 mph with a red flag?

The Prime Minister: I have been trying to follow my hon. Friend without lurching in logic, but I am finding it a little difficult to do so. I know that he is always anxious to make full use of the very latest technology and I will refer the matter to my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Q4. Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Michie: Is the Prime Minister aware that some school governors operating the pilot scheme for the local management of schools are resigning and that in some cases, such as Meersbrook Bank school in my constituency, they are not setting budgets because they cannot use budgets which mean sacking experienced teachers? How can the Prime Minister call for better education and training while agreeing with a budget which has forced school governors to sack experienced teachers?

The Prime Minister: I do not accept that. Many schools —possibly most—welcome the opportunity to control their own budgets. Head teachers are highly educated people who are well able and willing to take the responsibility that comes with freedom and they much prefer to have the say over their own school budgets. The complaint used to be that head teachers had control over only about £3,000 a year. Now they and the governors have control over the school budget and I am sure that they will use it better than it has ever been used before.

Mr. Butcher: As a staunch believer in the Act of Union, does my right hon. Friend agree that it would be in the interests of a fair-minded and even-handed approach between the peoples of England and Scotland if there were to be an increase in the number of English constituencies so that English Members of Parliament might enjoy serving constituencies of the same size as those in Scotland?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend has clearly asked a fundamental question, which it would take us a long time to consider in the House. I cannot see us bringing in any legislation ahead of the next election to put that into action.

Q5. Mr. Carlile: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. and learned Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Carlile: Does the Prime Minister support the Gladstonian doctrine of self-determination for all nations including small ones, or is she so dizzy with big-power politics as to appease the Soviet Union, particularly with regard to the Baltic states, and especially Lithuania?

The Prime Minister: I support the doctrine of self-determination for fully separate nations as set out by the United Nations. As for Lithuania, as I have said from the Dispatch Box before, we support its right to independence. We have never accepted that it was annexed legally by the Soviet Union. President Gorbachev also says that those states have a right to be independent. The difference of opinion between Lithuania and President Gorbachev concerns how that is to be brought about. It is a pity to get stuck on such matters when both sides can get down to practical discussions about how to bring independence fully into practical being. I hope that the Prime Minister of Lithuania goes to Moscow with proposals, as we all support that independence coming about by discussion.

Mrs. Peacock: Is my right hon. Friend aware of the great interest—especially in my constituency—in the Government's review of the community charge? Will she assure the House and my constituents that the Government will look sympathetically at all the representations now being put to them?

The Prime Minister: The Government are doing precisely that. There are several varying representations.

Some will have to be tackled in the longer term rather than in the period coming up to next year's community charge, but some can be dealt with before then. We shall make a statement to the House when we are ready.

Q6. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Thursday 17 May.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Haynes: Mr. Speaker, Sir, is the Prime Minister aware that in the past few weeks she has not had a very good time at Prime Minister's question time—have you, duckie? Is she also aware that the morale of the teaching profession is falling lower and lower because of Government policies? Is she further aware that I have two daughters and a son-in-law who are teachers and doing a first-class job? It is time that she got the Secretary of State for Education and Science by the scruff of the neck and dragged him out of negotiations which ought to be taking place between the authorities and the trade unions to negotiate proper earnings for teachers—then all our children will receive a better education.

The Prime Minister: Bearing in mind that all hon. Members address their remarks to you, Mr. Speaker, I thought that the hon. Gentleman addressed you by a rather endearing term. I believe that I heard him correctly, as I usually do.

With regard to the more serious aspects of the hon. Gentleman's question, I remind him that teachers are better paid than ever before. Their current pay, when it is fully implemented in January, will be 12 per cent. above Houghton, which was the largest salary that the Labour party aimed to attain. As the hon. Gentleman knows, we have also put forward new proposals for determining teachers' pay. In the meantime, I should point out that most teachers with seven years' experience will be at the top of the scale, and have a big incentive allowance; their salary will be £19,000, the deputy head of a typical secondary school will be earning £26,000—[Interruption.] I must answer the hon. Gentleman's question thoroughly, especially as so many members of his family are involved in teaching, and I am sure that they are very ambitious. The head of a typical secondary school will be earning nearly £34,000.

Mr. Gow: Has the proper condemnation by Her Majesty's Ministers of the two terrorist attacks in London this week been accompanied by an equal condemnation from Ministers in the Irish Republic? If those suspected of responsibility for the attacks in London should escape to the Irish Republic, in the belief—understandable—that they would find safe haven there, how confident is my right hon. Friend that a proper request for extradition would be upheld by the Irish Supreme Court?

The Prime Minister: I wish that I could answer my hon. Friend by saying that I would be confident that an extradition order would be upheld, but I cannot do so, as he knows. If justice is to be meted out, it is vital that we should be able to extradite people so that they have no safe haven in the Irish Republic. It is also vital, from the point of view of the police and all citizens of this country and Northern Ireland, that we fully uphold the Prevention of Terrorism Act.

Beef

The following question stood upon the Paper:

7. Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions he has held with the organisation, Parents for Safe Food, with regard to its allegations concerning the safety of British meat.

3.31 pm

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Selwyn Gummer): My officials offered some time ago to meet Parents for Safe Food to discuss its concern about BSE and meat, but the organisation has not taken up this offer, nor has it submitted any scientific evidence that we can study.

I am naturally concerned to ensure that the public know that the clear and consistent advice of the best scientific opinion is that British beef is safe.—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is an important matter, on which I am sure the House will wish to hear the Minister.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the House to the statement that the chief medical officer made yesterday. He said that he had taken advice from the leading scientific and medical experts in this field. To quote his words, "They have consistently advised me in the past that there is no scientific justification for not eating British Beef and this continues to be their advice.".

The Government have tackled the problem of BSE with a carefully considered and coherent programme of measures based on the advice of the most authoritative and independent scientific experts.

First, we destroy any animal that is found to have BSE and no part of it enters the food chain in any way. Secondly, any cattle entering the slaughterhouse have the specified offals that could harbour the agent removed. Those offals are not allowed to be used in any food or food products. Thirdly, almost two years ago we stopped the feeding of ruminant protein to cows and other ruminants. We thus cut off what is considered to be the source of infection.

In all this, we have followed the best independent scientific advice available. Even our critics must support this clear policy of taking that advice. The health of the public is our overriding concern.

There are always those who want us to take their advice and not the advice of the experts. I have been asked, for example, to ban the use of ruminant protein in pig and poultry diets. Doctors and scientists see no justification for that. Some have suggested that there should be a ban on breeding from the offspring of BSE-infected cattle. The Southwood committee did not recommend this. But I was concerned to ensure that all up-to-date information was taken into account so I referred the question back to the Tyrrell committee. It confirms fully what Southwood said. I am placing a full statement of its advice on this point in the Library.

We have taken action to deal with the public health concerns and the animal aspects of BSE on the basis of the best independent scientific advice. We have published that advice together with full information on the disease and how it is being tackled. We shall continue to keep the public fully informed. We have taken all necessary measures to tackle this disease. There is certainly no justification for the alarmist reporting that has appeared over the past few days. As the chief medical officer has confirmed, British beef can continue to be eaten safely by everyone—adults and children alike.

Mr. Mitchell: I thank my right hon. Friend for that helpful and detailed statement, which will be reassuring to the many consumers who have been alarmed by much of the speculative comment in the press in recent days. Will my right hon. Friend give the House the absolute assurance that to protect the interest of the consumer, he will base his policy on the best medical and scientific advice from independent expert sources and eschew some of the quack solutions and quick fixes that have been suggested in recent days?

Mr. Gummer: There must be two basic rules behind our action. First, consumer safety comes first and last. Secondly, our actions must be based on the best available medical and scientific advice. I assure the House that I shall not deviate from those two bases.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): I am sure that the Minister will agree that the irresponsible statements that have been made in the past fortnight about the BSE issue, without any proof or evidence, have caused consumers and producers alike a great deal of concern. To try to end this problem, will the Minister advise the Chairman of the Select Committee on Agriculture to interview scientists on both sides of the argument and to produce a report as soon as possible that will clarify the position? Does the Minister further agree that British beef today is better and healthier than ever?

Mr. Gummer: I very much welcome the Select Committee's inquiry and hope that the Chairman will take the hon. Gentleman's advice. I also hope that those people who have pontificated on television will now send the Tyrrell committee the research material that they claim to have so that it can be considered. I further hope that before interviewing people as "experts", the BBC, ITV and others will ask, first, whether those people have published their evidence in journals that their peers can check and, secondly, whether they have submitted their evidence to the Tyrrell committee. If those interviewed cannot say that, I hope that they will be interviewed not as experts but merely as people who have an idea or two.

Mr. Paul Marland (Gloucestershire, West): I join my hon. Friend the Member for Gedling (Mr. Mitchell) in thanking my right hon. Friend for his trenchant reply. I hope that it will do much to reassure the general public that British beef is safe. Does my right hon. Friend agree that it is outrageous that so many unsubstantiated claims have been made about BSE and British beef and that Opposition Members are flying in the face of sound scientific evidence, preferring to be guided by a bogus professor and a dead cat?

Mr. Gummer: We must not underestimate the anxiety that people are bound to have about an unpleasant disease that we wish to eradicate and which we must ensure is no longer in the British herd. Having said that, I should add that those who seek to make capital out of the perfectly natural concern of the public should look most carefully at their motives and wonder whether they are putting party political points before any real concern.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): As scrapie is known to be transmitted from ewe to lamb and as BSE is closely related to—indeed, derived from—scrapie, is not there every danger that BSE could be transmitted from cow to calf? Why do the Government hide behind Southwood and Tyrrell and not listen to the National Farmers Union president Sir Simon Gourlay, who wants the Government to introduce a slaughter policy of the calves of BSE-affected animals with 100 per cent. compensation?

Mr. Gummer: Although the hon. Gentleman is a doctor, he will agree that he is not an expert on this subject. He will also agree that on several occasions he has told me that I should not listen to the National Farmers Union but put the interests of the consumer first. Now he has said something peculiar. He said that I should not hide behind the opinions of the experts. I hope that he will read carefully what the expert Tyrrell committee said to me. It said that there may be positive disadvantages in taking the measures that the hon. Gentleman advocates.

The hon. Gentleman may shake his head, but he is not an expert. He may be a doctor, but he is not an expert. I should prefer to take the views of doctors who are experts than those of a doctor who is not an expert.

Mr. William Hague (Richmond, Yorks): Is my right hon. Friend aware that many of my constituents have expressed great support for his approach to these matters, but great surprise at the reference to him as a lout by an Opposition spokesman on a television programme? Would not that description be better applied to some of the academics and journalists who have written about the matter than to a Minister who is dealing with it responsibly?

Mr. Gummer: The serious issues that we are discussing are not helped by the abusive comments that have been made on television by the Opposition spokesman. We must deal with the matter seriously. I hope that the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark) will read the teleprint of what he said and perhaps take the opportunity to apologise. The matter is too serious to make that type of cheap comment.

Mr. Nigel Griffiths (Edinburgh, South): Will the Minister join me in congratulating the staff of the Moredun research institute in my constituency on its world-leading research on scrapie? Will he further condemn the cuts in the budget of that institute and guarantee to review the budget and increase it as necessary?

Mr. Gummer: I willingly admit how much we rely on the work that has been done by that institute. That is part of the reason why I have made it clear that the money that is necessary for research into both scrapie and BSE and across the board will be available wherever it is required. We must find the best answers to these questions. The hon. Gentleman is a responsible man and I hope that he will help by pointing out that the points that I have put forward today are fully supported by expert opinion, including that of the people at the research institute in his constituency.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): May I thank my right hon. Friend and the Parliamentary Secretary, my hon. Friend the Member for Penrith and The Border (Mr. Maclean) for their outstanding efforts to bring home to the British public the fact that there is no risk in eating British beef? Will he personally contact all the local authorities that have banned British beef? Will he make every effort to stop people pontificating on television and in the media without any scientific evidence?

Mr. Gummer: I have already contacted all the local authorities with the full background briefing. I have given them a fax number so that they can fax to a central control point any questions they may have. It is noticeable that Westminster city council first banned beef without considering any of the evidence. When it considered the evidence, beef went straight back on the menu. That must show that, when one reads and listens to what the Department of Health and the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food say, the evidence is overwhelming that what we are doing is right. The chief medical officer is perfectly correct in saying that British beef is safe to eat for adults, children and NHS patients.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clywd, South-West): I do not profess to be an expert on this subject. We have had a definition of "expert" as "ex" being the unknown factor and "spurt" being a little drip under pressure, and we are bandying the word about rather too much. Evidence shows that once the scrapie agent has passed through one set of laboratory animals, in this case hamsters, it would infect a rabbit, although not directly. That particular property of the organism is worrying. Has the Minister taken it into account? As the NFU and consumers are both asking for the same thing, the Minister should take on board what Simon Gourlay is telling him.

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman should be clear what the NFU said in its statement. I respect his knowledge of the scientific method, acquired from his own expertise. The information of which he speaks has been available for nearly 20 years and it has certainly been taken into account. Because I take the matter extremely seriously, I am happy to pass to the Tyrrell committee any information that he would like me to take fully and specifically into account. The committee's purpose is to bring the best group of experts together to look at the evidence and to advise.

I hope that the Opposition will follow the hon. Gentleman's view, which I have read in the press and believe to be accurate, which is to consider the situation as impartially as possible. Certainly, I am willing to take any sensible advice from him or anyone else, because we should all be involved in the eradication of BSE from Britain, and from animals in Britain and, above all, in the continued protection of the British public.

Sir Richard Body (Holland with Boston): Although I appreciate that my right hon. Friend is taking the matter seriously, does he agree that, if his officials continue to go about the country advising us in the farming community how to keep our animals in ever more intensive conditions, we shall face serious risks because we cannot continue to rely on the present level of antibiotics?

Mr. Gummer: I have read my hon. Friend's article in today's Evening Standard and many of the concerns that he raises are serious and are being addressed in a number of policy changes that we are making, not least the important proposals on extensification and the like. At a time when over-production rather than shortage is the key word in farming communities we certainly have the opportunity to look most carefully at what we do. I have already said publicly that I believe that feeding the ruminant to animals that are naturally herbivore is wrong because it is contrary to what would occur naturally. That is the line which I wish to draw and I believe that there is a real response to that in the public mind.

Dr. David Clark (South Shields): I wish to clarify the allegation made today in the House that I accused the Minister of being a lout. I was most upset when I heard that reported about me. We have a sound clip of the news item. I did not say that the Minister was a lout and I am sure that if he checks, he will find that that is not the case. I said that he had done nowt. If southern stenographers cannot understand the northern vernacular, I do not apologise for that.

May I take this opportunity of saying once again today that the Minister has done nowt? Does not he realise that his indecision and vacillation this week have lost the general public's confidence in beef? It has threatened the long-term future of our cattle industry. What the Minister said today has done nothing to reassure the general public or the farmers. The Minister made great play, and I take his point, of the need to follow the recommendatons of his own expert committee, the Tyrrell committee. If he takes that line, he cannot pick and choose advice from that committee. Why will he not implement the recommendation of the committee and take a random sample of routinely slaughtered cows so that we can judge the extent of BSE in the British herd and plan accordingly? In the meantime will he support the call for not feeding offals to pigs and chickens and to our pets?

Mr. Gummer: As I understand the hon. Gentleman's policy, it is to have regulations about Britain's food set by an independent group that is outside the Government. No doubt the hon. Gentleman would expect to take the advice of such a group. He says that when we ask an expert committee about, for example, the feeding of animal matter to animals that eat it, and the committee says that we should do so and there is no justification for not doing so, we should ignore the official advice. I cannot understand why the hon. Gentleman advances that proposition. He must accept that advice from such an independent body must be followed in a matter as serious as this.

The recommendations to which the hon. Gentleman refers are part of the Tyrrell recommendations for research and were in three groups. The first was about priority research, the second was about research that is not high priority but ordinary priority, and the third was about low-priority research. I have already instituted all the high-priority and normal-priority research and I am now going through the low-priority research. I am following that order, first, because the expert committee asked me to do it like that. That is why it had three sets of priorities. Secondly, there is a shortage of people with the expert knowledge that is needed to carry out this research. I have therefore placed those people in areas that the Tyrrell committee said were most important for public health reasons. I think that the House will accept that.

The hon. Gentleman has clarified that he did not call me a lout but said that I had done nowt. He cannot have been listening for the last 20 minutes. If he had, he would have heard me say that I have done everything that the expert advisers have asked. Indeed, I have gone further because I take from every healthy animal all the specified offals in order to provide yet another protection. It is entirely untrue to say that I have done nowt.

Business of the House

3.50 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are in the middle of business questions. I am amazed at hon. Members who have been here long enough to know that I do not take points of order before business questions.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Sir Geoffrey Howe): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 21 MAY—Opposition Day (12th Allotted Day). Until about seven o'clock there will be a debate on Ravenscraig, followed by a debate on bovine spongiform encephalopathy (BSE). Both debates will arise on Opposition motions.

Motion to take note of EC documents relating to the social charter. Details will be given in the Official Report.

TUESDAY 22 MAY—Opposition Day (13th Allotted Day, 1st part). There will be a debate on a motion in the name of the Social and Liberal Democrats entitled "Alterations and Amendments to the Poll Tax".

Remaining stages of the Town and Country Planning Bill [Lords], the Planning (Listed Buildings and Conservations Areas) Bill [Lords], the Planning (Consequential Provisions) Bill [Lords], and the Planning (Hazardous Substances) Bill [Lords], which are consolidation measures.

The Chairman of Ways and Means has named opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

WEDNESDAY 23 MAY—Motion for the spring Adjournment.

Motion on the Appropriation (No. 2) (Northern Ireland) Order.

THURSDAY 24 MAY—Adjournment debates.

It may be for the convenience of the House if I indicate that the business for the first week after the spring Adjournment will be as follows:

TUESDAY 5 JUNE—There will be a debate on the Army on a motion for the Adjournment of the House.

WEDNESDAY 6 JUNE —Opposition Day (14th Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion; subject for debate to be announced.

THURSDAY 7 JUNE —Remaining stages of the Food Safety Bill [Lords].

FRIDAY 8 JUNE —Private Members' motions.

Dr. Cunningham: I thank the Leader of the House for his thoughtful announcement of the business for the week following the Whitsun recess. That is a great help to all hon. Members. May we be told before the recess exactly when the Government intend to proceed with the division of the Select Committee on Social Services into two Committees, one on health and one on social services? There has been an extraordinarily long delay in the implementation of that decision. It is of considerable importance to hon. Members in all parties that the two new Select Committees should be established and allowed to get on with their work as soon as possible. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman tell us his intentions before the Whitsun recess?

May I also request information about the Government's intentions for the 21 poll tax-capping orders that the House will have to consider? I must make it clear that it would be intolerable if the House were asked to decide, in one short debate, the budgets and poll tax levels of 21 separate local authorities, covering services used by millions of people. It is unprecedented—it does not happen in any other country—that a national Parliament should decide these matters. It would be unacceptable to deal with all those orders in one and a half hours after 10 o'clock. I urge the right hon. and learned Gentleman to consider providing more time, preferably in prime time, for those important debates.

We shall have a debate in Opposition time next week on the devastating news for Scotland of the proposed closures at Ravenscraig. Can it be made clear who will be speaking for the Government, and exactly what the Government's policy is towards those closures? We hear a different story about the Government's attitude towards the Ravenscraig job losses from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry from that given by the Secretary of State for Scotland. The House and the people of Scotland, given the importance of Ravenscraig to the Scottish economy, are entitled to a clear and unequivocal statement of Government policy on the Scottish steel industry, exactly who is deciding that policy, and whether the Secretary of State for Scotland's position in the Government has now become untenable.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: On the hon. Gentleman's first point about the future of the Select Committee on Social Services, I have already given positive indications to the House about our intentions. I hope that the House will be patient for a little longer.

On the hon. Gentleman's point about charge capping, as he appreciates, it is now open to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment to lay before the House the draft order setting authorities' caps. He is considering carefully how and when to proceed, but, as was made clear to the court on his behalf, caps will not finally be set for the authorities involved in the judicial review before 18 June. As to when those debates should be conducted, there is room for more than one view, apart from that expressed by the hon. Gentleman.

The Government's speakers for the Opposition's debate on Monday will be made plain in due course, but there is no doubt that the Government's policy is that of the Government as a whole. The first and essential feature to notice is that the decisions taken in relation to Ravenscraig are being taken by the company on commercial grounds and the Government will be responding as Government, not seeking to influence those decisions beyond the powers that they have, which are extremely limited.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. As the House knows, I am always reluctant to curtail business questions, but we have an important statement and a debate in which we have to deal with many amendments after this. Therefore, I propose to allow business questions to continue until 4.30. If hon. Members ask single questions, all of them should be accommodated within that time. Mr. Harry Greenway.

Hon. Members: First again.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I have been last for the past two weeks.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Hon. Members should know that those who are called last on Thursday tend to be called early the next.

Mr. Greenway: May we have an early debate on gipsies and the legislation relating to them? There has been a large encampment of gipsies and tinkers at the side of the A40 in my constituency causing great harassment to the people of Greenford and Northolt. May we have an early debate on the need to improve legislation to get those people moving away from other people's homes?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The operation of existing legislation gives rise to concern in more than one constituency, but I cannot offer the prospect of an early debate.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): Why is there no opportunity next week or the week after to debate the disgusting, disgraceful and dirty conditions in which the Vietnamese refugees are forced to live in Hong Kong and which have given rise to the recent riots? Does not the Leader of the House see that the way in which those refugees are kept is unworthy of us, that they are treated as prisoners by people who are trained to look after criminals, and that we are asking for more riots unless we treat people properly in those camps?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There is no immediate prospect of a debate on that topic, although it has been brought before the House on more than one occasion, as the hon. and learned Gentleman knows. He must acknowledge that, however hard the people in charge of the camps may try, the conditions there are bound to become increasingly difficult until there is a satisfactory solution to the problem of how to achieve the speedy return of many of those people their own country.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Does my right hon. and learned Friend share my surprise that once again the Opposition have not chosen one of their Supply days to discuss their new policy review? That would give Conservative Members the opportunity to point out that, if tax rates had remained as they were in May 1979, every man on average earnings with two children in Britain would be paying £1,000 a year more in income tax. We find it strange that the Opposition, having always supported high taxes, now seem to be in favour of low taxes without explaining how they could spend more and yet cut taxes.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend draws attention to a point of legitimate importance. The House had an opportunity to discuss that on Monday on the motion in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for Hertford and Stortford (Mr. Wells).

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The Leader of the House told the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) that whoever speaks for the Government in Monday's debate on Ravenscraig will enunciate the policy of the whole Government. Before that debate, will the Leader of the House draw to the relevant person's attention the words of the Secretary of State for Scotland yesterday, when he said:

"we shall seek to persuade British Steel to reconsider its proposal in the interests both of the company and of its work force."—[Official Report, 16 May 1990; Vol. 172. c. 887.]?

Does the Leader of the House intend to keep us waiting, or will that be the policy that the Government will enunciate on Monday?

Sir Geoffery Howe: The decision was taken on commercial grounds, in the light of the company's judgment of market conditions, and it must remain a matter for the company's commercial judgment. I understand that the decision is not due to be implemented until the first half of next year. Any right hon. or hon. Members who are concerned about the matter, whether or not they are in government, will no doubt bring to the company's attention any commercial arguments for reviewing its decision.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): What has happened to the debate on the Police (Amendment) Regulations 1990? As they are extremely unwelcome to many policemen in my constituency, will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that he will bring the regulations before the House for proper debate shortly?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my hon. Friend knows, I have been seeking a suitable opportunity for just such a debate. Although one was not included in the business for next week that I announced today, I propose to arrange a debate at an early opportunity.

Mr. George Foulkes (Carrick, Cumnock and Doon Valley): Does not the Leader of the House realise that, in his replies to my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and to the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace), he contradicted what was said by the Secretary of State for Scotland yesterday? The right hon. and learned Gentleman has in fact disowned the Secretary of State for Scotland. I understand that he was disowned also by the Prime Minister's spokesman this morning. Will the deputy Prime Minister confirm that that was the case, and tell the House whether the Secretary of State for Scotland will come to the Dispatch Box to make a personal statement?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Government's policy is consistent and is held by all members of the Government. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland made a statement to the House about Ravenscraig yesterday, and the House will have a further opportunity to debate it on Monday.

Sir Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): My right hon. and learned Friend will be aware of the situation in the Baltic states, particularly in Lithuania. Will it be possible to arrange an early debate on how this country can best help them economically and with supplies in what is a very difficult situation?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and the Prime Minister continue to stress how important it is that moves should be taken to reduce, not heighten, tension in order to reach a solution acceptable to the people of Lithuania.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): As the Leader of the House may know, Shell intends to sell a subsidiary, Mitchell Gas, based in my constituency to Calor Gas. If that is allowed to go through, it will mean that there will be a virtual monopoly in Scotland, with one firm controlling the supply of certain gases, including butane and other gases important to industry and to people in general. Will the Leader of the House arrange a special debate next week? More importantly, will he block that takeover bid, bearing in mind the fact that the Government apparently believe in market forces?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall bring that matter to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): Will my right hon. and learned Friend resist the temptation to say, "There are Adjournment debates coming up"? Will he consider the situation on the Isle of Man, where we have had a Barlow Clowes all over again, and where there has been malfeasance of the worst possible kind, yet the Government are doing nothing about it? Is it not time that the Government exercised their responsibilities to the Isle of Man far more rigidly, brought to book those who have committed crimes, and made sure that everyone who has lost money is fully and properly compensated?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I shall bring my hon. Friend's points to the attention of those responsible for the enforcement of law on the Isle of Man.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Are we to have a debate on Europe before the Dublin summit? The Leader of the House will know that there is great interest in that meeting among right hon. and hon. Members on both sides of the House—not always following precisely party lines. What might be determined in our name could affect the future of the House of Commons, vis-a-vis not only Brussels but the Executive. It will not be satisfactory to be told after the Dublin summit that the Prime Minister has entered into agreements that might affect the future of the House of Commons in its relations with Europe. That matter is causing great concern. Will the Leader of the House give an absolutely clear assurance that the House will be able to give its view before the Prime Minister gives her decision?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The right hon. Gentleman may recollect that that topic has been the subject of study by the Select Committee on Procedure and it reported on it some months ago. In the course of the next week I hope to make available the Government's response to its recommendations, which will bear upon the points that the right hon. Gentleman has raised.

Mr. Richard Tracey (Surbiton): Could my right hon. and learned Friend arrange for a debate in the House on the extraordinary behaviour of the producers of the BBC programme "On The Record"? Apparently, an opinion poll which showed overwhelming support for the Prime Minister among Conservative councillors was suppressed when the poll, seemingly, did not suit the purposes of the programme's producers.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As my hon. Friend appreciates as well as anyone, the commissioning of research and the selection of material for use in programmes are matters for the editorial judgment of the broadcasters. I hope that they will take account of the views expressed by hon. Members, including those that my hon. Friend has just expressed.

Mr. Dafydd Wigley (Caernarfon): Will the Leader of the House find time for a debate on the financial crisis facing so many health authorities, in particular Gwynedd health authority, which is facing a £4 million shortfall, leading to the closure of wards and the elimination of services, and is hitting disabled people, the young and the old? In addition, six hospital closures have been announced for the next 12 months. May we have an early debate on that subject?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot offer the hon. Gentleman the prospect of an early debate, but I shall bring the matters he has raised to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): The Leader of the House will doubtless have seen the extremely disturbing report in yesterday's edition of The Times, based on evidence given to a United States Senate committee, that the cost of dealing with the greenhouse effect could absorb the entire national income of the United States. In view of that report, and the report of the committee in the other place on the scientific background to the greenhouse effect, may we have an early debate on that important subject, which has vast policy implications?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I do not doubt the importance of the issue my hon. Friend has mentioned, as it raises many questions. I cannot offer the prospect of an early debate specifically on that issue, but I shall bring his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House make time for a statement or a debate on the question of the parliamentary building across the road? Is he aware that there has been considerable delay and that one of the problems concerns the 40 marble fireplaces in rooms for Members of Parliament. Due to the Government's attitude to manufacturing industry in Britain, we have no one to produce such fireplaces, with the result the Italians have been called in to provide these £20,000 marble fireplaces—[HON. MEMBERS: "Each?"] Yes, £20,000 each. The contractors in Italy have said that they would like to provide the fireplaces but that they need to use Italian labour. No wonder the unemployment figures are beginning to rise.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman will understand that all matters relating to the provision of the new building across the road, including phase 1, are under the closely attended management of the New Building Sub-Committee of the House.

Mr. Michael Marshall (Arundel): Will my right hon. and learned Friend assure us that we shall have an early opportunity to debate the electoral processes in central and eastern Europe, given that they will come to a head next month? Will he particularly bear in mind the concerns of hon. Members on both sides of the House who have met Romanian parliamentary candidates about the election there? Will he reiterate the Government's position in that regard?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to that matter once again. The House has expressed its anxiety on more than one occasion about the manner in which those elections are being and are likely to be conducted. As he knows, provision has been made for the presence of independent observers there to assess the standards to which he has drawn our attention.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement next week from the Secretary of State for Employment on the sale of skill centres, because the Government have failed to reveal information about why they did not tell bidders for the centres that £11 million would be given to three civil servants and would not be available to the others? The Government did not tell other bidders that 27 skill centres were to be sold to Astra Training Services. There has been a conspiracy of secrecy on the matter. It is taxpayers' money and we should know the details, and it is vital that there is a requirement that civil servants should not be given inside advantage to purchase publicly owned assets. We should have a statement next week about this further rip-off of taxpayers.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman will have an opportunity, in a more intelligent setting, to ask those questions of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment on Tuesday next week.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): Is the Leader of the House aware that the Labour party is now committed to repealing all the trade union reforms that we have introduced during the past 10 years? Since that hostility bears down on individual rights and can only create confusion and mayhem in the workplace, may we have an urgent debate on the matter after the Whitsun recess?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend correctly draws attention to yet another aspect of the Opposition's policy that could do grave damage to the economy.

Dr. John Reid (Motherwell, North): Does the Leader of the House recall that last week I asked him whether the Government would make a statement on steel policy? Is he aware that, had such a statement been made, we might have been able to change British Steel's disastrous decision to close the hot strip mill at Ravenscraig? The absence of a Department of Trade and Industry statement is tragic both for the Government and for Ravenscraig, since there are deep divisions between the Department of Trade and Industry and the Secretary of State for Scotland. It was extremely unfortunate that we did not have the opportunity, during Prime Minister's questions today, to hear that the Government support the fight for Ravenscraig. Unfortunately, the random selection of supplementary questions did not allow any of the Scottish Members of Parliament to be called, and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a reflection upon the Chair. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will withdraw that remark. He was called twice yesterday.

Dr. Reid: I said that the random selection of questions unfortunately did not allow one Scottish Labour Member of Parliament to be called, and I stand by that. Will the Leader of the House allow us to question the Department of Trade and Industry by bringing the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to the Dispatch Box to answer directly for the consequences of his privatisation programme?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The position remains exactly as I have already stated it: this is a matter for the commercial judgment of the company. It was the subject of a statement and questions in the House yesterday afternoon; it will be the subject of a further debate in the House next Monday.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Will my right hon. and learned Friend find time in the near future for a debate on the regulations governing the Data Protection Act 1984? A document has been sent to me by constituents—it is a Labour party document from the private office of the Leader of the Opposition—requesting Conservatives to give money. It has not attracted much support, but the document purports to say the following, in very small print: "Labour would never make"——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must paraphrase, please, not read.

Mr. Jack: The document goes on to say that people's names and addresses will be given to carefully screened companies as a result of this application. This is a matter for investigation.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I am sure that the House will be grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the matter. I hope that it is studied as it ought to be by those responsible for the circulation of the document.

Mr. Thomas Graham (Renfrew, West and Inverclyde): Will the Leader of the House confirm the statement made by the Prime Minister's press officer, Mr. Bernard Ingham, that the Secretary of State for Scotland is receiving no support in Cabinet and that he stands alone? Will he arrange for the Secretary of State for Scotland to make a statement about why he stands alone and why he is not getting support for the steel workers at Ravenscraig?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The Secretary of State for Scotland stands as a member of the Government with the full support of the Government. Government policy is the same for all Ministers. Obviously there is concern about the consequences of any commercial decision, but the fact remains that the decisions affecting Ravenscraig are commercial decisions. They were the subject of discussions in the House yesterday, and they will be the subject of further discussion on Monday.

Mr. Stephen Day (Cheadle): Will my right hon. and learned Friend arrange for a debate next week on the appalling decision of the Civil Aviation Authority not to recommend the mandatory introduction of smoke hoods into civilian aircraft? Is he aware of the seriousness of the matter? It is rumoured that many people lay the blame at the door of the CAA for the consequent cancellation by British Airways of an order for smoke hoods and for the possible withdrawal of one leading manufacturer? Given that safety matters are involved, particularly in the light of what happened at Manchester airport a few years ago, will he allow the House to debate the competence of the CAA?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I cannot comment on the detail of what my hon. Friend has said, but I promise to bring the matter to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Salmond.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): He has not been here.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I decide who is called. The hon. Gentleman represents the Scottish National party.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): The whole House heard the Leader of the House say earlier that the Government would not seek to influence British Steel over Ravenscraig. The whole House heard the Secretary of State for Scotland yesterday tell the House that he would seek to persuade British Steel to change its position. Will the Leader of the House now try to reconcile those apparently irreconcilable statements or tell us who has cut adrift from the Cabinet; is it himself or the Secretary of State for Scotland?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There is no rift of any kind whatsoever. It is a matter for commercial judgment, but, as I said earlier, it is open to hon. Members on both sides of the House to advance any arguments that they wish to bring to the attention of the company. That matter can be debated on Monday.

Mr. Edward Leigh (Gainsborough and Horncastle): May I return to the question asked by my hon. Friend the Member for Surbiton (Mr. Tracey)? Although I suppose that one should take opinion polls commissioned by the media with a pinch of salt, hardly a weekend passes when I do not vote in The Sunday Times poll for my hon. Friend the Member for Littleborough and Saddleworth (Mr. Dickens) as leader of the Conservative party. However, there is an onus on the media when they commission such polls which claim to speak for the public to publish all the polls or none of them; otherwise, they are seriously misleading the public.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: My hon. Friend is entirely right to draw attention to that matter and to express his view on it.

It remains the responsibility of those in the media who handle these matters, but clearly they will wish to take note of what has been said by my hon. Friend, among others, in the House.

Mr. Norman Buchan (Paisley, South): Will the Leader of the House seriously reconsider what he has said this afternoon? First, he has totally and utterly repudiated the statement that we heard yesterday from the Secretary of State for Scotland. Secondly, he is jumping ahead of the debate. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has been presupposing the decision of the debate before the House of Commons debates the matter. He is not entitled to presuppose whether we shall decide to interfere with the decision taken by British Steel, or at any rate to bring pressure to bear on the company. Each time he says that it is purely a matter of commercial decision by the firm, he is jumping ahead of the decision of the House. Will he withdraw that?

Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman ensure that the spokesman for No. 10 Downing street speaks openly? Even a civil servant has been put in the position of denying the statement by the Secretary of State for Scotland, and it is time that that finished.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have been making the same point throughout the discussion——

Mr. Buchan: But the right hon. and learned Gentleman should not do that.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The decision is a matter for the commercial judgment of the company. It remains that, but, as I have also made clear, it is perfectly open to hon. Members——

Mr. Buchan: It is open to this House.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Hon. Members, individually and collectively, are entitled to make representations and express views on matters that should be taken into account by the company. However, the decision is a matter for the company on commercial grounds.

Mr. Chris Butler (Warrington, South): Will my right hon. and learned Friend find time next week for a debate on bureaucratic insensitivity in local government? Tragically, a disabled constituent of mine died on 2 April, and the Labour council in Warrington sent her son a poll tax bill of 21p. Is that not scandalous?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: As the Prime Minister made clear in answer to a similar question on a similar point some weeks ago, there is no obligation on a local authority to deliver a bill for a sum of that kind. It is a matter about which local authorities have discretion, and one hopes that that discretion will be exercised sensibly.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are six more minutes before we move to the next statement. The length of questions will determine how many hon. Members I can call.

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): Surely there is now an overwhelming case for the Secretary of State for Scotland to make an urgent statement. After all, the Leader of the House, as deputy Prime Minister, has this afternoon repudiated what the Secretary of State said in the House yesterday, and said throughout Scotland and to the media last night. In addition, we have the news that this morning Mr. Bernard Ingham said that the Secretary of State for Scotland was on his own on this issue. Is it not sad and humiliating that, whereas last Friday, in Aberdeen, the Prime Minister stood four square beside her Secretary of State for Scotland, on Wednesday of the following week she has allowed him to stand alone and discarded as he is repudiated by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, by the British Steel Corporation and now, it would appear, by No. 10 Downing street?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman returns to the same set of fantasies—[Interruption.] The Government take a single view on this matter. The Secretary of State for Scotland addressed the House on it yesterday and the House will be looking at it again on Monday.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): May we have a debate on the catering arrangements for hon. Members and their families? Is it not deeply shocking when a Cabinet Minister cynically force-feeds his own children on television with beefburgers that he cannot even guarantee are contaminant-free?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The hon. Gentleman has a more grotesque capacity than almost any other hon. Member in the House for following a single track to destruction. I have nothing to add to what I have said on this subject on many previous occasions.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): The Leader of the House will be aware that, as the Environmental Protection Bill makes its way through the House, the Nature Conservancy Council part of the measure is proving to be of great concern. Will he cancel the press conference that has been arranged for tomorrow to give the Government's response to the Carver report and instead deal with it in the proper way, and that is by arranging for a statement to be made in the House next week?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend is handling the matter exactly as it should be handled.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman aware that, since yesterday, the Cabinet has upheld the point of view of the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Gow) against that of the Secretary of State for Scotland? I draw attention to column 894 of yesterday's Official Report. If, as seems clear, the Secretary of State for Scotland in making his statement yesterday was not speaking for the Government—that is precisely what Mr. Ingham has been telling the media—it is necessary for the House of Commons to understand that point officially, since the Secretary of State for Scotland's statement yesterday did not reflect the view of the Cabinet. In those circumstances, we are entitled to know who will speak for the Government on Monday.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: There is a limit to the number of times one can say the same thing. The Secretary of State for Scotland explained the position to the House yesterday. The House will have an opportunity of addressing itself to the matter on Monday.

Dr. Cunningham: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. It arises directly out of what is happening and what the Leader of the House continues to say. Yesterday the Secretary of State for Scotland said:

"we shall seek to persuade British Steel to reconsider its proposal in the interests both of the company and of its work force".—[Official Report, 16 May 1990; Vol. 172, column 887.]

In using the word "we", the Secretary of State was speaking on behalf of the Government—on behalf of the Cabinet as a whole. Now we have the Leader of the House disavowing that statement. We have also had official briefing from No. 10 Downing street, on behalf of the Government, disavowing it, and it has been disavowed by the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. We are entitled to know just what is the policy of the Government on this important matter concerning Scotland.

Mr. Speaker: That has nothing to do with me; it is wholly a matter for the Government.

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): Will the Leader of the House kindly arrange for the Home Secretary to make an urgent statement on his failure to establish the Football Licensing Authority which, although it is now months after the Bill was passed, has no chairman or chief executive? There is tremendous conflict because Lord Justice Taylor's report must be implemented during the close season, at a cost of many millions of pounds, by football clubs that do not know where they stand because that authority has not yet been established.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: I will bring the point to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): May I use my question to appeal to you, Mr. Speaker, to allow my right hon. Friend and——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That would not be in order. This is business questions to the Leader of the House.

Mr. Madden: May I, therefore, ask the Leader of the House if he will express a willingness to remain in the House to answer the questions that my right hon. and hon. Friends want to ask on a most important issue? Some of us resent strongly the limits that have been put on the opportunities for Back-Bench Members to raise at this time and at other times issues of urgent importance to their constituencies.

The Housing Corporation is in deep financial crisis. Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman arrange for the Secretary of State for the Environment to make a statement next week about what the Government are doing to enable new homes for rent to be built, including in my constituency?

Sir Geoffrey Howe: All that I can and will do is to draw the point to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Mr. Speaker: I must tell the hon. Member for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) that I have a long memory. I remember him rising last week and calling me to account for not calling Front-Bench Members while the television cameras were on. He is now saying something rather different.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I shall take points of order in a minute.

Mr. Tony Banks: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I repeat that I will take points of order after the statement.

Northern Ireland (Stevens Report)

4.32 pm

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Brooke): With permission, I should like to make a statement about the report of an inquiry conducted in Northern Ireland by Mr. John Stevens, deputy chief constable of Cambridgeshire. Mr. Stevens was appointed on 14 September 1989 by the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary to conduct an inquiry into allegations of collusion between members of the security forces in Northern Ireland and loyalist paramilitaries, and to make recommendations. He presented his report to the Chief Constable on 5 April 1990 and, subsequently, he has prepared a summary of his findings and recommendations. That summary, together with a copy of the complete report, was made available to me earlier this week. The Chief Constable made the summary report publicly available earlier today. Copies have been placed in the Library of this House and that of another place.

Mr. Stevens conducted a most thorough and wide-ranging inquiry in which, as he himself stresses, he has at all times received full co-operation at every level from both the RUC and the Army. In connection with his inquiry, 94 persons have been arrested, of whom 59 have either been charged with, or reported for, a variety of criminal offences. The majority of these cases are covered by the sub judice rule and it would be improper for me to comment further about them.

The report from Mr. Stevens was addressed to the Chief Constable. Many of its conclusions and recommendations are primarily for him to consider. Others are for the Army authorities in Northern Ireland or for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Mr. Stevens found that the passing of information to paramilitaries did take place, but that it was restricted to a small number of individuals and was neither widespread nor institutionalised. Moreover, he has recognised that steps taken by the police and the Army both before and since September 1989 have already significantly reduced the risk of repetition. No document so far traced to the possession of loyalist paramilitaries bore a recent date. Mr. Stevens recognises that there must be some tension between the need to disseminate information for operational purposes and the need effectively to safeguard that information.

Mr. Stevens finds, nevertheless, that there were deficiencies in procedures for identifying and accounting for documents containing sensitive information. Far too much material was circulating at any one time and the easy availability of photocopiers further extended the risk of unlawful dissemination. Accordingly, the report contains a number of detailed recommendations aimed at further improving the arrangements for the dissemination and control of all sensitive information; already some of these have been and others are being implemented. Mr. Stevens notes that the absence of adequate control procedures at the material time severely hampered the efforts of his inquiry to discover the origins of documents and to trace persons who might have been criminally responsible for passing them on and that, for related reasons, it cannot be assumed that a document with a particular provenance was leaked directly from the organisation that produced it.

As Mr. Stevens's own summary makes clear, any evidence or allegation of criminal conduct was rigorously followed up. No charges have been laid against any member of the RUC. Mr. Stevens concluded that there had been misbehaviour by a few individual members of the Ulster Defence Regiment. That is a matter of great regret to me, as I know that it is to the great majority of those honourable and courageous men and women who are the backbone of a very fine regiment; and I therefore welcome Mr. Stevens's equally firm conclusion that it would be wholly wrong to believe that a significant proportion of members of the UDR were involved wth paramilitaries. The House will know that steps have already been taken to tighten up procedures for screening potential members of the regiment. Mr. Stevens has made recommendations for further improvements in the arrangements in that area.

I see nothing in the findings of the Stevens inquiry to lessen my convictiion that the UDR plays a vital and valued part in the Army's support for the police-led anti-terrorist effort. I am conviced that the regiment is fundamentally sound; I am fully aware of the great efforts that continue to be made by the regiment steadily to improve its effectiveness and professionalism, and I have no doubt that the overwhelming majority of its members impartially serve the whole community in Northern Ireland. I remind the House that, in that service, more than 180 serving and more than 40 former members of the regiment have been killed in Northern Ireland in the past 20 years; only two days ago, 11 members of the UDR were decorated or were mentioned in dispatches.

Mr. Stevens also makes proposals relating to the technical and scientific support services available to the RUC's anti-terrorist work, identifying in particular scene-of-crime examinations, fingerprint analysis and the scientific examination of possible exhibits. The need for improvements in many of those areas had already been recognised by the Chief Constable, and Mr. Stevens's recommendations in those areas will now be for the Chief Constable to take forward. I stand ready to respond as sympathetically as I can to any specific recommendations that the Chief Constable may wish to put to me.

Painful though its findings in some respects may be, the Stevens report is a most valuable document. It has highlighted shortcomings and deficiencies in several important areas. Action by the police and the Army to remedy many of the deficiencies to which Mr. Stevens has drawn attention has already been taken, or is now in hand; and immediate consideration will now be given to his detailed recommendations for further improvements.

I am sure that the whole House shares my gratitude to the Chief Constable of the RUC for initiating this inquiry, and to Mr. Stevens for the exemplary care and vigour with which he has carried it out. It will contribute to increasing the skill and dedication with which the security forces carry out their vital task of combating and defeating terrorism in Northern Ireland, wherever it is to be found. I hope that the whole House will join me in paying tribute to the skilled, courageous and impartial way in which they carry it out.

Mr. Kevin McNamara (Kingston upon Hull, North): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement, and for his courtesy in supplying me with a copy of the summary of the report. On behalf of Her Majesty's Opposition, I should also like to thank Mr. Stevens and his team of officers for their efforts in a long, gruelling and—on occasions—no doubt frustrating series of investigations.

[Mr. Kevin McNamara]

I read Mr. Stevens's report with mixed feelings. It is regrettable that he was forced to admit that, in some cases, although he had found evidence of wrongdoing, it was impossible to trace the culprit. His admission that will dismay the supporters of the rule of law in Northern Ireland and throughout these islands. It will not enhance the reputation of the security forces; nor will it facilitate co-operation with the Irish security forces.

"in the present climate, leakages of information from the Security Forces may never be completely eliminated"

We should not forget that it is believed that the leakages have a direct connection with the deaths of several individuals. It is important for confidence in the security forces that they should not harbour people whose loyalties may at best be divided. On the other hand, Mr. Stevens has provided a great service in his recommendations for the future. Whatever the deficiencies of the report as a criminal investigation, it is certainly an impressive management consultancy report.

Judging by Mr. Stevens's recommendations, it is obvious that the inquiry team has discoverd appalling laxity in the handling of information by the security forces and in the recruitment procedures of the UDR, which has resulted in some unfortunate publicity attaching to certain members of the regiment.

Can the Secretary of State assure us that he, the Minister of State, the police authority and the Chief Constable will act immediately on Mr. Stevens's recommendations, to ensure that, in Mr. Stevens's words:

"Any future collusion between the security forces and paramilitary terrorist groups will be eradicated"?

In particular, will he assure us that the document production and distribution procedures will now be made traceable? Will he assure us that the present level of computer security, which apparently would be a disgrace in an ordinary commercial organisation, will now be replaced by proper arrangements?

Will the right hon. Gentleman, in conjunction with the Secretary of State for Defence, ensure that proper personnel procedures are put in place so that the difficulties that afflict recruitment to the UDR can be removed once and for all? We welcome the recommendation that the Ministry of Defence should now justify, at senior level, the rejection of RUC advice on recruiting, but it will be regretted that the final decision was not left in the hands of the RUC, because the recommendation that the MOD should have the last say does not follow the logic of Mr. Stevens's report.

The Chief Constable has said in statements today that perhaps not all the published recommendations will be implemented. Will the Secretary of State urge him to say which recommendations will not be implemented and why?

Can the right hon. Gentleman tell the House the range of charges that have been preferred as a result of the inquiry—although I understand the problems associated with the sub judice rule?

I hope that the Secretary of State realises that the concerns expressed by Mr. Stevens are concerns which we all share. We hope that he will treat the matter with the urgency that is deserves. He will have the full support of the Opposition in implementing the thrust of Mr. Stevens's recommendations. In the battle against terrorism—whether loyalist or nationalist—there is no room for complacency.

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his opening remarks about the manner in which the matter was handled and for the congratulations that he offered to Mr. Stevens. I heard his expression of regret that, despite the intense thoroughness of the inquiry, Mr. Stevens was not able to pursue a number of matters fully.

As I hope was evident from the spirit of my statement, we shall be responding as promptly as may be to the recommendations. I temper my words in that way only because there are 33 recommendations, and their implementation will involve different time scales.

We agree with the broad thrust of the recommendatons. Inevitably, some of the recommendations are for the attention of people other than myself, but I shall be collaborating with them in their response. As regards the matters that are for me, I shall respond as sympathetically as I can to any propositions that the Chief Constable puts to me.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the traceability of documents and access to the computer. He will find from the summary that, in the case of the former, improvement has already been effected by all the interested parties, and the Chief Constable responded at the press conference that he gave this morning to the recommendations relating to the computer. The hon. Gentleman will know that a considerable amount has been done in the past six months on the vetting of recruits to the UDR. He expressed his regret that the RUC should not have the last say. I think that this is an instance in which it is simplest for us simply to disagree.

The hon. Gentleman referred to the statement that not all the recommendations will necessarily be followed up. It is probably better to let that matter take its course, given that some of the recommendations are highly detailed. Those of us to whom the recommendations are directly or indirectly made will indicate the nature of our response to them.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the range of charges. As he said, those matters are sub judice and it would probably be inappropriate for me to comment.

Finally, the hon. Gentleman asked the Government to respond urgently and I can assure him that the need for urgency will be observed.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): What does Mr. Stevens mean by recommendation 65:

"Introduce interview of applicants' referees"?

Did no one tell him that that procedure was introduced in 1971?

Does the Secretary of State recall my request to him to consider publishing a further paper when the various charges have been processed to give detailed breakdown of the number of people arrested for questioning, the number released after questioning, the number whose cases were put to the Director of Public Prosecutions and the number of cases that were rejected by the DPP?

Does the Secretary of State agree that, although the Stevens summary has enlightened us all greatly on the technicalities of computers and photocopiers, it does nothing whatever to clear the reputation of the 28 Ulster Defence Regiment soldiers who were arrested so dramatically for publicity purposes one Sunday morning, only seven of whom have subsequently been charged, and convicted of non-terrorist related offences? To put it in plain language, I understand that they were convicted of having a few spare rounds in their possession. What soldier does not commit that offence?

Will an adequate apology by given to those men, considering that many of them had to move house after being treated as if they were terrorists? Will adequate compensation be given to them and will apologies be offered to the regiment to which they belong?

Mr. Brooke: The right hon. Gentleman's first question related to recommendation 65 in Mr. Stevens's summary. No doubt he will forgive me if I say that his question was addressed more to Mr. Stevens than to me, although there will be analysis and a response to that recommendation.

The right hon. Gentleman's second and third questions related primarily to individual members of the UDR who were arrested in the course of the inquiry. I rest on my earlier remarks about the sub judice rule, although I realise that some of the cases have already been handled. The right hon. Gentleman referred to those who have had to move house. There are, of course, full administrative procedures for handling that matter, which is one for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence.

Rev. William McCrea (Mid-Ulster): There are those who will be disappointed by the report and see deficiencies in it because it reveals that the political hype directed against the security forces in Northern Ireland was totally unwarranted. Does the Secretary of State agree that any fair-minded person will welcome the fact that Mr. Stevens has reported that "the passing of information to paramilitaries by Security Force members has been restricted to a small number of individuals. It is neither widespread nor institutionalised"?

Bearing in mind the fact that there are 28,000 members of the security forces and given that the Stevens report states that such activities are restricted to a small number of individuals,, does the Secretary of State agree that it is time for every Member in the House to give his or her wholehearted support to the security forces in their fight against the real enemy of democracy—the terrorist throughout the United Kingdom? This part of the United Kingdom has suffered ghastly incidents in the past few days.

Recommendation 59 suggests:

"Consider location of home address of applicants".

Can the Secretary of State give a clear undertaking that, in judging the calibre of an applicant to the security forces, the guiding principle will be not his address but his person?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to the fact—as I sought to do in my statement—that Mr. Stevens has drawn attention to only a small number of individuals, and that he does not regard any such activity as general or institutionalised. I am sure that the whole House will join the hon. Gentleman in welcoming that.

I am also delighted to sustain the hon. Gentleman in what he says about the whole House giving support to the security forces in the dangerous and highly responsible tasks that they carry out on behalf of the whole community. I know that he would not wish that support to be blind, that he would wish the rule of law to continue to be upheld and that he will recognise that in inviting Mr. Stevens to conduct that inquiry, the Chief Constable has been loyal to that thesis.

Recommendation 59 is a matter of detail which will be looked at. I shall certainly ensure that the attention of those who will be responding to that recommendation will be drawn to the hon. Gentleman's remarks.

Mr. Merlyn Rees (Morley and Leeds, South): In asking a question about the UDR, I agree with the Secretary of State that none of us should forget that 220 members of the UDR are dead as a result of their activities. We on this side of the water quite properly get upset when people on this side are killed. Two hundred and twenty is a large number of people to have been killed, and I take that into account when asking this question.

Is not it the case that over the years the UDR has had a high turnover of people? Given the importance of police primacy and what I detect, on a quick reading of the report, to be a mix-up between the roles of the UDR and the RUC, would not it be better to increase the numbers in the RUC and the RUC Reserve and to keep the UDR as a smaller force, with a lower turnover, to do a limited job—an Army job?

Mr. Brooke: I am most grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for drawing attention to the numbers. Although I fear that that number now exceeds 220, he is right that it is an appalling number.

Although I believe that the turnover is probably lower than the right hon. Gentleman imagines, I acknowledge that some people do not stay all that long with the regiment. However, others have served in the regiment consistently since its formation and I pay tribute to them for their bravery.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to the balance of the security forces. The armed forces have had to be increased during the past five years when, as a result of Libyan armaments, there has been a rise in the level of violence, but it is the number of those serving in the regular Army that has been increased, not the number of those in the UDR. However, there has been a shift in the UDR in that period.

Mr. Ian Gow (Eastbourne): Is it a source of satisfaction to my right hon. Friend that, after the serious allegations that have been made against the Ulster Defence Regiment and his own RUC, the Chief Constable appointed Mr. Stevens to carry out an inquiry; that that inquiry received the utmost co-operation throughout from the Ulster Defence Regiment and the RUC; that that inquiry was one of the most thorough that has ever taken place; and that the report has been published almost in full and has been the subject of a statement in the House?

Is not it a tribute to the way in which we are trying to cleanse the island of Ireland of terrorism that those procedures have taken place? Will my right hon. Friend reaffirm, despite the criticism in the report, his total confidence in both the RUC and the Ulster Defence Regiment?

Mr. Brooke: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for the tone and terms in which his question was framed. The inquiry that Mr. Stevens carried out was the most intensive and extensive inquiry of its kind ever to be undertaken in the United Kingdom. We should all derive satisfaction not only from its thoroughness, but from its findings. I am delighted, as my hon. Friend has so invited me, to express my total confidence in both the RUC and the UDR.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): The Secretary of State will be aware that the inquiry has been described in some quarters as "political hype". I remind the right hon. Gentleman and the House that the inquiry began as a direct consequence of the murders of my constituents. In July 1989 Loughlin Maginn was murdered and three men were charged with his murder, two of whom unfortunately —I emphasise the word "unfortunately"—were full-time serving members of the Ulster Defence Regiment——

Mr. Molyneaux: From Great Britain.

Mr. McGrady: Well, they may have been from Great Britain, but that is not what I am talking about.

Immediately after that—five days later—the loyalist paramilitaries gave an exhibition of montages of considerable detail to the press. Some months later, loyalist murder gangs were intercepted by the security forces on entering my constituency of South Down, with the specific purpose of murdering constituents of mine who had been named in those leaked documents.

I do not consider this to be a matter of "political hype" or something to be taken lightly. This issue is fundamental to the recognition of and respect for law and order in Northern Ireland in all its contexts. Caesar's wife must be absolutely pure in all circumstances.

I cannot comment in detail on the report, so I simply shall refer to the Secretary of State's statement. I am concerned that some 60 people have been found guilty or will be charged with colluding in the perpetration of a crime. I remind the House that the crime that we are talking about is murder. We are talking about collusion in the murders of innocent people. That is why this matter is so important and why I hope that the Secretary of State will act with the greatest possible urgency in executing the revisions that have been found necessary and exposed in the report.

This is not the first time that various screens and processes have been reorganised. That has happened at least five or six times in the past 20 years. What is going wrong in allowing those evil people to slip through the net —[Interruption.] Another point that I should like the Secretary of State to address—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. Gentleman bear in mind that he should address questions to the Secretary of State, not comments?

Mr. McGrady: Why has it taken such a long time for adequate controls to be put in place?

Last but not least, the Secretary of State said that the Stevens inquiry referred to Army investigations and RUC investigations. Did the Stevens inquiry investigate the operation of the secret units within Northern Ireland, which are setting paramilitary against paramilitary, and community against community, and working outside the rule of law or the control of the RUC and the British Army?

Mr. Brooke: I join the hon. Gentleman in his observation that the matters that gave rise to the inquiry were not ones to be taken lightly. The Chief Constable responded to a series of events in Northern Ireland by inviting Mr. Stevens to carry out an inquiry that has lasted for a full eight months. I salute the Chief Constable for his original decision and Mr. Stevens for his conduct of that inquiry.

The hon. Gentleman should allow for the fact that there is clear evidence that the action of the paramilitaries in producing the information that gave rise to the inquiry in the first instance was clearly intended to discredit the security forces, which are the paramilitaries' enemies, in so far as they act on behalf of the whole community.

It would be a mistake for us to discuss the 59 charges in detail across the Floor of the House, not only because of the sub judice issue, but because the hon. Gentleman's question slightly generalised the charges.

I give the hon. Gentleman the same pledge about urgency that I gave the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, North (Mr. McNamara), who spoke for the Opposition.

The hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady) also asked me about adequate controls. I should say—some of this is apparent in the summary—that long before the Stevens inquiry was set up, the Army and the RUC were already taking measures in that area. Mr. Stevens also refers to the many members of the RUC who were interviewed about that.

The hon. Gentleman's final question takes us into a level of operational detail, which is more a question for Mr. Stevens than for me.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): At this time I think of my constituents and all the other innocent people throughout the Province who have been slaughtered by the Irish Republican Army. I thank God for the Ulster Defence Regiment and the Royal Ulster Constabulary. In my view, the report, which I have hastily read, confirms that a large and expensive sledgehammer has been used to crack a miserable nut. The Secretary of State was right when he said that what generated the inquiry was the paramilitary Ulster Defence Association sending some photographs to the press.

What was the cost of the inquiry, which seemed to turn into a general inquisition and fishing expedition to satisfy republican demands, as part of a campaign to denigrate and undermine the UDR and RUC? Many people in Northern Ireland would agree that if all the effort and money expended on the report and the inquiry had been directed against the IRA, more terrorists would have been apprehended and more innocent lives saved.

I remind the Secretary of State of the protest that I made in the House in October of last year when a young constituent of mine was pulled out of his bed in the early hours of the morning and dragged off to a police station. He was a serving member of the UDR. Everyone in the neighbourhood was aware of his arrest because of the noise from the police vehicles. A few hours later, after hype and publicity in the press, he was released and allowed to rejoin his young wife and child. He was an innocent man. It was a disgraceful way in which to treat him or any other member of the UDR.

Mr. Brooke: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would wish to extend his tribute to the UDR to other parts of the security forces.

Mr. Kilfedder indicated assent.

Mr. Brooke: He said that we had taken a sledgehammer to crack a nut. I state on behalf of the Government that the rule of law is beyond price and confidence that the rule of law is being maintained is a matter of great importance to everyone in the House. I do not have an absolutely up-to-date figure for the cost of the inquiry, but I understand that up to a recent date it had cost £500,000. Many hon. Members will agree that such expenditure and thoroughness was justified in view of the objective that we sought. Mr. Stevens himself said:

"Written statements have been taken from over 1,900 witnesses and suspects; 2,000 investigative enquiries undertaken and almost 2,000 man hours expended on interviews with detained persons. Over 2,600 documents of all types, have been recovered"

On the hon. Gentleman's last point, it would not be right for me to comment on an individual case. However, I salute his conscientiousness as a constituency Member of Parliament in bringing it to my attention.

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): As the Secretary of State made clear in his statement, the implementation of Mr. Stevens's excellent report will require action by more than one Department and co-operation between Departments. How will he ensure that there is an overall strategy to give us confidence that all the recommendations of the Stevens report will be brought into effect? Will he also take steps to ensure a consistency of standards across the Irish border so that the police in the Republic apply similar standards on the issues described by Mr. Stevens?

Does the Secretary of State agree with me that the Stevens inquiry was not assisted by the Irish News which made many allegations but refused to back them up by producing evidence?

Mr. Brooke: I give the hon. and learned Gentleman the assurance that he requested about action. As I have already said, I cannot prejudge the response to particular recommendations. They are addressed to several different Departments of State, including the Ministry of Defence. The 83 recommendations have been made as a package and we shall seek to concert our general response on an interdepartmental basis.

The hon. and learned Gentleman asked about cross-border matters. I have a suspicion that the Government of the Republic of Ireland will be interested in discussing the report with me on the next occasion that I meet them. I shall certainly bear in mind what the hon. and learned Gentleman said when I do that. He was right about the conclusions of the Stevens inquiry about the inability of the Irish News to sustain the allegations that it initially made.

Mr. Michael Mates (Hampshire, East): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the instances of individual wrongdoing by members of the security forces must be firmly dealt with and that Mr. Stevens is to be congratulated on the way in which he has done it? Is it not astonishing that so few instances have been found, given the strain and stress under which the security forces operate? Does he agree that as long as the security forces have to risk life and limb on the streets of Ulster and in the countryside there, they must have access to photographs of people wanted in connection with offences? Therefore, the simplest way to prevent any further instances will be for the terrorists to lay down their arms, stop killing and maiming innocent men, women and children and seek political solutions to the problems that they seek to solve. Is it not extraordinary that in his criticism of my right hon. Friend's remarks, the Opposition spokesman on Northern Ireland could not bring himself to say one word in praise of our security forces and their sterling work or one word of condemnation of terrorism?

Mr. Brooke: I am particularly grateful to my hon. Friend for the way in which he worded his remarks about the nature of the report and its findings, given his position on the Select Committee for Defence. I have already said that we welcome the fact that only a small number of instances of wrongdoing were highlighted by Mr. Stevens. We are all aware of the stress under which the security forces operate in Northern Ireland. As my hon. Friend rightly says, they are daily at risk of death at the hands of terrorists. The main lesson of the report was that the Chief Constable was determined to make sure that the rule of law is maintained within the Province.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): In view of the alarmist stories that appeared in the republican press, is not paragraph 41 of the report, which says that the practice was confined to a small number of individuals and was neither widespread nor institutionalised, worthy of the greater possible publicity? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that Mr. Charles Haughey, the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic, receives a copy of the report immediately?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing attention to paragraph 41, to which other hon. Members also drew attention. I have made it possible to make a copy of the report available to the Government of the Republic of Ireland.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): Is it not remarkable that so many citizens of Northern Ireland are prepared to serve with the UDR after doing a day's work, bearing in mind the onerous nature of the duties and the high casualty rate? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the key to the matter is improved and thorough vetting of those who join the regiment? Will the Government stick to their guns and make sure that the regiment decides, after taking the best possible advice, who is good enough to serve in it?

Mr. Brooke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his tribute to the UDR. It is perhaps worth drawing the attention of the House to the fact that last year 11 million man hours were spent out of bed by members of the regiment in defence of the community in Northern Ireland and that 1,000 vehicle checkpoints are mounted every night, with all the danger that that involves for those who mount them. I acknowledge the importance of vetting. I confirm that the Government will stand by their position on the process of recruitment into the regiment. On top of that, emphasis will be placed on training and further professionalisation, which the regiment has constantly in hand.

Mr. McNamara: Is the Secretary of State aware that it was not a member of the Opposition who made a statement in the House which resulted in an alleged terrorist not being extradited from Ireland because it was felt that he would not have a fair trial? Is he further aware that I have been delighted to accept an invitation to join the UDR on training procedures in the north of England next week?

Mr. Brooke: I am not absolutely certain that I recognise the relevance of the first part of the hon. Gentleman's question to today's statement. I warmly welcome his decision to participate in the training procedures of the UDR. If he could go further and urge more Catholics to join the regiment, he would be doing a considerable service to Northern Ireland.

Whitsun Adjournment Debates

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. Members that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Thursday 24 May up to 10 Members may raise subjects of their choice. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning and the result made known as soon as possible.

Ravenscraig

5.10 pm

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I call Maria Fyfe first.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I should be glad of your advice. On Monday the House will debate Ravenscraig. Are we to understand that the Government's policy is as described by the Leader of the House or as described by the Secretary of State for Scotland? How should we expect Tory Members to be whipped and to vote on Monday? Will they tell us that Ravenscraig's future must be determined on commercial criteria or will they be whipped to defend Ravenscraig?

Several Hon. Members: Further to that point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that it will not be further to that point of order, because I could not possibly answer such a question, but I will listen.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Further to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. I failed to catch your eye during Prime Minister's Question Time, or to get a clear answer from the Leader of the House during business questions. Scottish Members have no early opportunity to clarify the position of the Secretary of State for Scotland inside the Government. Today in press briefings No. 10 has made it clear that the Secretary of State is isolated from and disowned by the rest of the Cabinet and that he does not speak for Government policy. At this critical juncture in our history Scotland cannot afford to have its representatives in the Cabinet publicly humiliated in this way. Can you advise me how within the rules of the House we can ensure that the Secretary of State for Scotland comes to the Dispatch Box before the weekend to answer Scottish Members' questions?

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let me deal with the matter. Yesterday I granted a private notice question and every hon. Member who was present was called. I cannot say whether the Secretary of State will answer the debate on Monday. The Opposition are using their time for a debate and that is the occasion when hon. Members should put their questions.

Several Hon. Members: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. In that case, they cannot possibly be points of order for me. The opportunity arises on Monday.

Mr. John Maxton (Glasgow, Cathcart): On a different point of order, Mr. Speaker. We have a political crisis in Scotland. The Secretary of State for Scotland, who is the representative of the Government in Scotland, has been repudiated by his Cabinet colleagues. I have the press statement that the Secretary of State issued yesterday and the early-day motion signed by the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) and his five Back-Bench colleagues, which demands that British Steel changes its mind and invests in Ravenscraig.

I appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that you may not have the power to demand that the Secretary of State comes to make a statement about his position, but clearly we cannot allow the crisis to run over the weekend without the Secretary of State making his position clear. Even if you do not have the power to demand that, you have the ability and persuasive powers to phone the Secretary of State when you leave the Chair and ask him to come to the House and clarify his position because it has become wholly untenable.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I had better take all these points of order together. I call Mrs. Ewing.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. In your earlier response to the hon. Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion) you referred to yesterday's private notice question and said that hon. Members who stood were called to speak. None of us will deny that. However, what has happened since is of great significance. The Leader of the House and deputy Prime Minister clearly said that the Government would not seek to influence the decision, which is in complete contrast to what the Secretary of State for Scotland said yesterday. It is absolutely intolerable for Scottish Members to return to their constituencies with two completely different messages from the Government. Surely the Secretary of State must clarify that for us tonight or early tomorrow morning.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will appreciate that this afternoon's events raise serious questions about the identity of the Secretary of State for Scotland. As he has been wholly repudiated by his right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the House, he is not just semi-detached, but completely adrift. Have you received any notification that the right hon. and learned Member for Edinburgh, Pentlands (Mr. Rifkind) has been replaced by the hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) as Secretary of State for Scotland?

Mr. Speaker: I cannot answer any of those questions. However, I am pleased to tell Scottish Members that I am looking forward with great pleasure to visiting Scotland this weekend for the general assembly of the Church of Scotland. I hope that I may have the opportunity to discuss these matters informally with the hon. Members concerned.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will have noticed that charges, real or imaginary, have been levelled against me. May I take this opportunity to make it clear that I have no problem in standing behind the Government's decision. None whatever. I stand by my question yesterday and there is nothing contradictory about it.

I support what the Labour Opposition are attempting to do and I see nothing contradictory about that. My question made it clear where I stand on this issue.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. We can leave the matter until Monday. It sounds as though we shall have an interesting debate.

Orders of the Day

Employment Bill

As amended, (in the Standing Committee), considered.

New Clause 10

CALLING OF INDUSTRIAL ACTION WITH SUPPORT OF BALLOT

To move the following Clause:—

'.—(1) In section 11 of the Trade Union Act 1984 (requirements for ballots on industrial action), after subsection (4) insert—

"(4A) The voting paper must specify who, in the event of a vote in favour of industrial action, is authorised for the purposes of section (Calling of industrial action with support of ballot) of the Employment Act 1990 to call upon members to take part or continue to take part in the industrial action. The person or description of persons so specified need not be authorised under the rules of the union but must be within section 15(3) of the Employment Act 1982.".

(2) Industrial action shall not be regarded for the purposes of section 10 of the Trade Union Act 1984 or section 1 of the Employment Act 1988 as having the support of a ballot unless it is called by a specified person and the following conditions are satisfied.

(3) The conditions are that—

(a) there must have been no call by the trade union to take part or continue to take part in industrial action to which the ballot relates, or any authorisation or endorsement by the union of any such industrial action, before the date of the ballot;

(b) there must be a call for industrial action by a specified person, and industrial action to which it relates must take place, before the end of the period of four weeks beginning with the date of the ballot.

(4) For the purposes of this section a call shall be taken to have been made by a trade union if it was authorised or endorsed by the union; and the provisions of subsections (3) to (7) of section 15 of the Employment Act 1982 apply for the purpose of determining whether a call, or industrial action, is to be taken to have been so authorised or endorsed.

(5) In this section—

"date of the ballot" has the same meaning as in Part II of the Trade Union Act 1984;

"specified person" means a person specified or of a description specified in the voting paper for the ballot in accordance with section 11(4A) of the Trade Union Act 1984; and

"trade union" has the meaning given by section 28 of the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974.'—[Mr. Howard.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

5.16 pm

The Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Michael Howard): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to take the following: Amendment (a), subsection (2), leave out from 'person' to the end of subsection (4).

Government amendments Nos. 15 to 17.

Mr. Howard: These amendments relate to the ballots that must take place before industrial action can attract immunity from the normal legal consequences which would follow from such action.

One of the most important reforms of trade union law introduced by this Government has been the requirement for unions to ballot their members and obtain a majority vote for action in a secret ballot if they are to have protection against legal proceedings for organising a strike.

It is thanks to that legislation that we have seen the end of the appalling practice of union leaders calling their members out on strike without giving them any opportunity to express their views, or after sham democratic procedures, such as a show of hands in a car park—with all the intimidation and irregularity which often accompanied such performances.

I must remind the House that every shadow employment spokesman in the past 11 years has led his colleagues through the Lobbies to vote against each and every piece of trade union reform legislation introduced by this Government. Even the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith), now the personification of Labour's new moderate media image, was no exception. Indeed, the right hon. and learned Gentleman led the bitter opposition of the Labour party to the very legal provisions concerning ballots which the Labour party is now apparently claiming to accept, and which are directly relevant to the provisions before the House.

Our legislation has worked because it contains the necessary elements to make it work. For example, if there is no proper ballot, an affected employer or union member denied the vote can get an effective remedy from the courts. More important, it is clear that the ballot must take place before the union calls for industrial action.

New clause 10 is at the heart of this group of amendments. Therefore, it will be helpful to the House if I describe its provisions in some detail. The amendment adds a new subsection to section 11 of the 1984 Act. Section 11 sets out requirements that must be satisfied if a ballot is to give a union protection against actions in tort by an employer or customer or supplier of an employer who may be damaged by the union's inducement of members to break or interfere with the performance of contracts, or proceedings by a member of the union under section 1 of the 1988 Act.

New subsection (4A) requires the voting paper in a ballot to specify who is authorised to call on members to take part in or continue with the industrial action to which the ballot relates. The person or description of persons need not be authorised under the union's own rules, but must be among those whose act of calling for industrial action would be an act of the union for the purposes of section 15 of the 1982 Act. The amendments also have the effect, by virtue of subsection (2), that industrial action is not taken with for the purposes of section 10 of the 1984 Act and section 1 of the 1988 Act unless it is called by a person specified on the voting paper. Further conditions are contained in subsection (3).

"the support of a ballot"

In summary, the provisions mean that if a ballot is to give a union protection against legal proceedings for organising industrial action, the voting papers in a proper ballot must specify the person or persons authorised by the union to call the action to which the ballot relates. If there is a call to take action by any official who is not specified on the voting paper, the union will have no protection. In practice this means, for example, that if the union does not repudiate effectively what the unspecified official has done, it will be liable to legal proceedings by employers and-or members.

Mr. Robert Hughes (Aberdeen, North): Is the Secretary of State saying that specified persons must be the president, every member of the executive and every shop steward employed in the company in which there is a ballot? What does he mean by a specified person?

Mr. Howard: It is for the trade union to decide whom it wishes to specify on the ballot paper. We do not intend to limit the power of the trade union to specify an appropriate person. I hope that the hon. Gentleman is satisfied with that answer and that he will congratulate the Government on the openness of this part of the provisions.

Why have we come forward with these provisions? First, we believe that it is right that union members voting in an industrial action ballot should know whom their union intends to have the authority to call for the action to which the ballot relates. Secondly, where a ballot produces a majority in favour of action, union members should know whether an official's call to take that action following the ballot has the backing of their union. Thirdly, it would clearly be contrary to one of the main purposes of the Bill if a union leadership were allowed simply to stand aside if there is a premature call to take action by wholly unauthorised officials following a ballot. The provisions of the amendments mean that if this happens in future—and it happened, for example, only last year when Ford shop stewards did exactly that—the union will have to repudiate the call effectively or accept liability to court action by an employer or member.

In summary, the new clause enhances democratic practice, and is a logical extension of the law in view of the provisions of the Bill which will, very properly, make unions responsible for what their officials, including shop stewards, do.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): The Secretary of State says that it is up to the trade union to specify the appropriate people. Will he ensure that the people who are specified and whose names appear on the ballot paper are given immunity from subsequent victimisation by the employers?

Mr. Howard: I do not see how that matter arises. Those people are likely to be officers of the trade union concerned. If the union thinks it appropriate, they can be shop stewards, but that is a matter entirely for the union, which can nominate whomever it thinks appropriate for these purposes.

Mr. Ron Leighton (Newham, North-East): Perhaps the Minister will recall the family that used to be in a radio programme, one of the parents in which used to say, "Find out what Johnny is doing and stop him." That is basically the way in which the Government operate in these matters. Workers have very few rights, but when industrial action occurs from time to time the Government bring in legislation to stop it. The Minister gave an example of what happened at Ford. Would he like to explain in more detail what happened and what he is trying to stop?

Mr. Howard: I thought that I had explained that. All we are trying to do is to make sure that everybody should know in advance who is entitled to call industrial action after a ballot has taken place. At Ford, the official union leadership did not recommend that action should be taken following the ballot. Shop stewards recommended action and claimed the protection of the ballot, although it was almost certainly within everyone's contemplation that it was the union leadership that had called the ballot and that it should be responsible for calling action pursuant to that ballot. We are not suggesting that in no circumstances should shop stewards be able to call industrial action and claim the protection of the ballot. We suggest that if they are to have that protection they should be specified on the ballot paper so that everyone knows the exact position and there is no doubt or misunderstanding.

Mr. Robert Hughes: Does not the Secretary of State see a possible difficulty? If the union puts on the ballot paper every member of its executive and every shop steward in the company, what happens if there is a division of opinion, as often occurs between the executive and the shop stewards? The shop stewards may take one view and the union may take another. How will that help industrial relations?

Mr. Howard: No doubt the union will wish to reflect on that matter when deciding who to name on the ballot paper. As I have said, that is entirely a matter for the union. If it wishes to confine decisions to its executive it will name on the ballot paper only members of its executive. If it wishes to extend to shop stewards the power to take this decision it will name them on the ballot paper.

We believe that union members should have a vote in a properly conducted secret ballot, and that such a ballot must produce a majority in favour of taking action before their union calls on them to take any industrial action. The amendments will help to ensure that future union ballots about official action give voters the information to which they are entitled and that union leaders will not be able to evade their proper responsibility if industrial action is called by an unauthorised official following such a ballot.

These are sensible measures which will be welcomed by employers, sensible union members, and the public at large. If some union leaders and the Opposition resist them, as apparently they intend to do, that can only be interpreted as further opposition to the very idea that there should be proper democratic practices in union affairs, and that unions should be properly responsible for what their officials do. I commend the amendments to the House.

Mr. Tony Blair (Sedgefield): The new clause is totally unnecessary. It will land trade unions in interminable legal wrangling, and it is a recipe for chaos. It has been introduced without any consultation or discussion, it has not been the subject of any Green Paper or White Paper and it was never mentioned in Committee. It is a piece of political meddling and that is the only reason for its introduction. In its brief the British Institute of Management says:

> "We remain unconvinced of the beneficial effect of the proposal that Unions become liable for unofficial action undertaken by Union officials . . . Placing excessive further legislation in the area of industrial relations immediately introduces an element of confrontation between employer and union, de-stabilising the relationship by providing one side with a weapon."

Questions have been asked about the names on the ballot paper and whether a person might be liable to victimisation. Clause 6 contains detailed provisions about union endorsement of action and repudiation, and they are far tougher than the normal rules and regulations of companies. Surely, once the ballot is held, it should be up to the union to decide who it wants to call the action.

[Mr. Tony Blair]

Let us suppose that the union wishes to change a person on the ballot paper. Does that invalidate the entire exercise? I suppose that it does under the new clause.

5.30 pm

Secondly, I wish to put a point to the right hon. and learned Gentleman which, if he were serious and responsible, he would wish to reflect upon. Let us suppose that a ballot is held and that there is then an unofficial strike call. Currently, because the strike is not called by the union, it is unofficial. Under the proposed new clause, an unofficial strike called by someone not specified on the ballot paper would be unlawful industrial action for which the union would be liable—except in the one set of circumstances mentioned in the Secretary of State's press release of 9 May, which is if the union repudiates the action. Let us suppose that the ballot had a majority in favour of industrial action and shop stewards who were not specified on the ballot paper called out their members, and the union then decided that it agreed with that action. Does that mean that unless the union repudiates the action it is unlawful? If the union wants to endorse the action and make it official, does it have to re-ballot? We need answers to those practical questions.

I am astonished that nothing was mentioned in Committee about the new clause. The only example that the right hon. and learned Gentleman gave was of an industrial dispute last year, not one during or subsequent to the Committee proceedings. The only reason for the new clause is to place a further disproportionate and unfair burden on trade unions. The right hon. and learned Gentleman already has adequate provisions in the Bill and he should not put on unions further burdens that could land them in legal action for no good reason.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): The new clause is trivial and can lead only to further confusion. It is objectionable. It might, perhaps, add some knowledge to mankind if those who can call industrial action are specified on the ballot paper. However, that can lead only to further opportunities for lawyers to have some fun. The courts have already said that they find this area of industrial relations law complicated enough, without the Secretary of State making it even more complicated.

The right hon. and learned Gentleman did not answer the legitimate question asked by the hon. Member for Aberdeen, North (Mr. Hughes). The new clause provides for the specifying of not only a single person, but several persons. The hon. Member for Aberdeen, North said that a number of people might be specified, but that after the ballot had been held and there was a majority in favour of industrial action—the very circumstances to which the new clause is directed—there might be a split among those specified persons. After all, it is not at that stage that a union decides whom to specify—they have already been specified. How does that improve the present practice? As the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) said, nothing has happened since the end of the Committee stage to prompt the new clause. It indulges in a degree of detail that can only benefit lawyers and does little to enhance industrial relations.

Our amendment (a) seeks to tackle the conditions set out in subsections (3)(a) and (4). When read in conjuction with clause 6, it appears that if an official, whether or not specified by the union, called action on a particular issue, and if the union failed to repudiate that action, there could never be a valid strike ballot on that issue. That could lead to the anomaly of union members declaring in favour of action, but, under the new clause, the will of that majority being defeated and a valid strike ballot not taking place. I am sure that that is not what is intended—or perhaps it is. That is why we tabled our amendment.

If the Government are trying to achieve the aims set out by the Secretary of State, that can be done by subsections (1) and (2), and further conditions are not necessary. The new clause is trivial. On a day when unemployment seems to be rising again, the Secretary of State surely has better matters on which to concentrate his mind.

Mr. Howard: I am astonished by the reaction to these modest provisions which, far from complicating matters, clarify them. They enable trade unions to make it clear, with considerable precision—as much as they think appropriate, having regard to the conditions—who should be allowed to call industrial action. It is a simple clarifying measure and the Opposition's reaction astonishes me.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Something has just crossed my mind. What would happen if the person nominated on the ballot form passed away? Would there need to be a fresh ballot?

Mr. Howard: Not at all—the other people specified can call the industrial action——

Mr. Skinner: What if only one person is specified?

Mr. Howard: That might be a good reason for a trade union not doing anything so foolish as to name only one person. It is entirely a matter for the union. If it were foolish enough to specify only one person who then, unfortunately, suffered the fate predicated by the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), it would have to hold another ballot. That is why it would be so silly for a trade union to specify only one person.

I wish to answer the questions posed by the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair). These provisions follow so directly and consistently the general structure of the remainder of the Bill that there is hardly any need to consult on them. Anyone with strong views has had the opportunity to express them. They fit within the framework and the structure of the Bill.

If I understood the hon. Gentleman correctly, he requested that a union should be allowed to choose those authorised to take action. It is. That is the purpose of the provisions. As I said, the union would make that decision.

Mr. Blair: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman deal with the point that concerns us most? If a shop steward who is not specified on the ballot paper decides to call out his members—let us suppose that he calls them out at 2.45 pm—and the union is also minded to call out the members—let us say that it intends to do so at 3pm—do the provisions of the new clause mean that the union could not endorse the action of the shop steward at 2.45 pm and that a fresh ballot would have to be held?

Mr. Howard: If those who are specified on the ballot wish to exercise their right to call for industrial action, they can do so. Their right to do so is not affected by the fact that someone who was not authorised to do so had already done so.

Mr. Blair: Let us get this point perfectly clear. Is the right hon. and learned Gentleman saying that if there is an official strike call, the union can repudiate that but then endorse it?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman is predicating a sequence of actions on the part of a trade union which is difficult to follow. A few moments ago, he described a situation in which, within minutes of someone who was not on the ballot paper calling industrial action, the union and those who were authorised to take industrial action by being named on the ballot paper chose so to do. Their ability so to do would in no way be affected by the fact that someone else who was not authorised had done so. Therefore, that cannot conceivably be a serious problem.

Mr. Leighton: Some of us are a bit perplexed about why the Minister has introduced the new clause at this late stage and why he is getting involved in such pernickety detail. Who has asked for this? Was it the trade unions or employers? Did he consult anybody? There was nothing in his Green Paper about it. Has any reputable body asked for this? Why has he become involved in this a year after the event, when it was not considered in Committee?

Mr. Howard: The hon. Gentleman will not be entirely astonished to hear that we can look at such matters, decide whether there is a mischief which needs to be remedied and take the appropriate action if we think that it is necessary. It is not necessary in every case to wait for someone to suggest that action should be taken. In the light of the circumstances which arose in the Ford dispute last year, it seemed sensible to clarify the matter, to remove the confusion and to make it entirely clear that a trade union should be in a position to specify in advance just who should be authorised to take the appropriate action following a ballot.

Amendment (a) would remove certain requirements which are part of the present law on balloting for industrial action. Perhaps the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) will tell us whether that is his intention. For example, the amendment appears designed to allow trade unions to call for industrial action before holding a proper secret ballot if the official who calls the action is specified on the voting paper.

Mr. Wallace: I said that the mischief that the amendment was designed to tackle was that subsection (3)(a), read with subsection (4) and clause 6(3), could mean that, if any union official not mentioned on the ballot paper, whether employed by the union or not, called on the members to strike on a particular issue, there could be no subsequent strike ballot on that issue. That may be a wrong interpretation, but that was the mischief which we were trying to attack. Is the Secretary of State satisfied that such a situation could not arise? If so, there would be no need for the amendment. But if it could arise, is that something which he would countenance? If not, can he suggest a form of words which would tackle that without giving rise to the consequential effects of my amendment which he has described?

Mr. Howard: In answer to my challenge, the hon. Gentleman has raised an entirely different point which I have already answered because it was put to me by the hon. Member for Sedgefield. The fact remains that amendment (a) would allow trade unions to call for industrial action before holding a proper secret ballot. The question I posed, which the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland has conspicuously failed to answer, is whether that was his intention.

Mr. Wallace: That was not my intention. The Minister knows my intention and he is being oleaginous in the extreme in not answering directly.

Mr. Howard: I am delighted to hear that that is not the hon. Gentleman's intention. Perhaps in those circumstances he will accept that his amendment is misconceived.

The amendment would also remove the requirement that the call for action by a person specified on the ballot voting paper should be within four weeks of the ballot —another provision of the existing law which is an entirely necessary and reasonable requirement, which the hon. Gentleman appears to acknowledge.

The hon. Gentleman's amendment would also strike out provisions that are necessary to determine what is to be taken for relevant purposes as a call by a trade union. If those provisions were deleted in accordance with the amendment, that would simply produce confusion and doubt. In addition, as if that were not enough, it would leave it unclear whether a union could ever escape liability for a premature call by an unauthorised official, which the present provisions allow through the process of effective repudiation.

The fears, such as they are, that have been expressed by Opposition Members are entirely misplaced. This is a sensible and modest provision which introduces clarity and greater certainty into the law, and I commend it to the House.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Clause read a Second time, and added to the Bill.

New Clause 1

EMPLOYER'S BREACH OF STATUTORY DUTY

'An industrial tribunal shall have jurisdiction to entertain a claim for unfair dismissal by an employee dismissed for taking part in unofficial industrial action where it finds that the reason for the action was a genuine and reasonable belief by the employee that the employer was acting in breach of statutory duty whether in respect of health and safety matters or other matters connected with the terms and conditions of the employees of the employer.'.—[Mr. Tony Lloyd.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With this, it will be convenient to take the following: amendment (a) to the new clause, at end insert

'or because the employee or employees were genuinely unaware of action being taken by their union to try and resolve the dispute.'.

New clause 4—Health and Safety—

'An employer has no right to dismiss selectively any employee who refuses to work on any site, location, or job which the said employee considers to be dangerous to his health, or involves contact with any substance he has grounds to believe is hazardous to health.'.

Amendment (a) to new clause 4, after 'right' insert

'without seeking the advice of the Health and Safety Executive'.

New clause 7—Involvement of Health and Safety Inspectorate

'In circumstances where an employee refuses to work on any site or job in which he believes there is a danger to his health, a Health and Safety Inspector must be called under such circumstances to inspect the site or job, from whom a formal safety declaration will be required before any work resumes.'.

New clause 8—Safety Committees—

'(1) Every employer shall be required to establish a safety committee at his place of work to which his employees shall elect representatives.

(2) The safety committee, which shall comprise equal numbers of employer and employee representatives, shall, by majority vote, have the authority to suspend work where it believes there is a risk of harm or serious injury to employees or to ancillary workers.

(3) The suspension of work shall remain in force until the alleged hazard has been inspected by a Health and Safety Inspector and a formal declaration by the Health and Safety Inspector that the hazard has been removed.'.

Amendment No. 19, in clause 7, page 7, line 26, after '(1)', insert

'save where matters of health and safety are concerned.'.

Amendment No. 24, in page 7, line 37, at end add—

'(c)) The action is being taken by employees who genuinely believe that their employer is in breach of statutory duty in respect of health and safety matters.'.

Mr. Lloyd: As the Minister of State knows, because the pattern is familiar to us—and I believe it would be fair to say that he has no reputation to lose—the clauses in the Bill to which we took the strongest exception are those dealing with unofficial action. We particularly object to the concept of selective dismissal for the crime, in the Government's eyes, of taking unofficial industrial action. The Government also seek to take away any protection whatsoever from a person sacked for that reason in respect of recourse to an industrial tribunal. That represents a further significant move away from any semblance of fairness.

We have raised that issue on a number of occasions but received no satisfactory answer. Employees who felt compelled, in order to maintain a health and safety regime at their place of work, to take a form of industrial action might find themselves threatened with the loss of their jobs, and would have no protection under present law.

We have already established in general terms that the very interests that the Government prayed in aid as in need of protection against such action have said that they do not want it. I refer in particular to the reaction of London Regional Transport. The strikes on the underground were one motive for the Government's rush into this legislation. LRT made it clear that it felt that this part of the Employment Bill was useless and would be counter-productive to good industrial relations.

On numerous occasions we told the Government that people had been forced to take industrial action in defence of health and safety. One illustration that I gave to the Minister was the strike on the Isle of Grain site in the Thames estuary, when people producing concrete linings for the channel tunnel project took industrial action because the company refused the request for a permanent staff nurse on site. Although there was industrial action, there was no interruption of the contract of employment by management and nothing that the Minister could use in his defence to say that management were outside the scope of the legislation. The workers who took strike action in February 1989 would have been liable to selective dismissal had the rules in the Bill been in force. The Bill would have allowed management to pick off the ring leaders of the strike.

In Committee, the Minister's defence was that people wishing to take unofficial industrial action already had legal rights if management operated an unsafe health and safety regime, as it had therefore abrogated its contract of employment with the work force; therefore, the clauses Nos. 1 and 4 would not have any impact.

The Opposition has taken a considerable amount of advice on the issue, and the Minister has already seen some of it. He knows that there is no reputable legal argument to sustain the view put forward by the Government in Committee. The Minister may want to pray in aid other sources of information, but I think that legal opinion is unanimous in the view that the law is clear about what constitutes unofficial industrial action.

In Committee, the case of Power Casemakers Limited v. Faust established that when judging unofficial industrial action as defined in the two new clauses, the employers' or employees' motivation does not need to be taken into consideration. What is relevant is whether the employer was in breach of his contract with his employees when unofficial action was taken. The Minister looks puzzled, but we have pointed this out on a number of occasions, and I am surprised that the arguments still puzzle him. This issue is central to the Minister's case and it is central to our case, because he is wrong, and that exposes people in their workplace to injury and to losing their jobs if they seek recourse to industrial action to protect themselves.

At the moment, much attention is focused on the channel tunnel. It is a pity that the Secretary of State has chosen to absent himself from the debate. I was pleased to see him driven from his inertia on health and safety last week. He did something positive about the disgraceful accident rate in the tunnel. If Conservative Members feel that that is not the case, perhaps they would like to say what the Minister has done in the past when people have been dying. I do not think that Conservative Members are in any position to argue that case, because the Minister did nothing until he was driven to it by the considerable criticism of the tunnel company in the press.

I have been asking about this issue for some time. I wish to draw the House's attention to a log book for locomotive drivers working in the tunnel. One driver's comment was:

"The warning beacon obstructs the view to the rear. If somebody is killed as a result of poor visibility to the rear it will be blamed on the driver. These beacons are put in a ludicrous position right in the driver's field of vision . . . Move them before somebody is hurt or killed".

The same point is made time and again in the log books. They are available to the company; they are the company's log books. However, nothing is done.

Ironically, one of the locomotive drivers was sacked yesterday by Transmanche Link. He drove one of the vehicles which are considered to be unsafe. The company claims that he had refused to take instructions about where he was to work and it suspended him. He went through a four-stage disciplinary hearing, which found him guilty of indiscipline. That may be the case, but he claims that he was dismissed because he was a safety representative and because he had refused to work in conditions which he thought to be unsafe.

The point at issue is that, as the law stands, that man has the opportunity to claim that he was unfairly dismissed, but once the Bill comes into force, if the company can argue that he was taking industrial action or refusing to work, because it would be classed as unofficial action, he could be dismissed without recourse to a tribunal. There would have been no examination of the rights or wrongs of the case.

We know that work in the channel tunnel is unsafe. Even the Secretary of State is concerned about that now. One reason is there is considerable pressure on workers to put progress before safety, with the result that there has been a high accident and death rate.

If we take away workers' rights to defend themselves by having recourse to some form of industrial action, the Minister will once again put lives at risk in the tunnel. I insist that the Minister deals with that issue when he responds to the debate.

Legal opinion is firmly on our side in this matter. In Committee and on Second Reading the Minister said that it was not his intention to make life more difficult for people in the workplace as regards health and safe working conditions. If that is the case, the modest amendments that we have tabled would not undermine the two clauses dealing with unofficial industrial action but would give recourse to an industrial tribunal—in new clause 1—so that it could decide whether health and safety issues had been a factor in dismissals. We are not asking the Minister to rip up the Bill or that part of it which deals with unofficial action. We are building into the Bill a simple defence so that workers will not feel that the only way that they can protect themselves is by using industrial action to guarantee that they and their workmates are not put at unnecessary risk.

It would be simple for the Minister to accept the new clauses as a minimum form of safety standard. If he does that he will have the support of the whole House, but if he does not, he must examine the consequences for people at work. He will be jeopardising their position and putting them at risk of injury or ultimately, as we have seen in the channel tunnel, of death.

Mr. John P. Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): I agree implicitly with my hon. Friend's argument about people at work. This issue could also affect the public in some circumstances. Earlier he referred to London Regional Transport and British Rail. The increase in the number of near misses and cases of overshooting red lights reported by British Rail is worrying. Train drivers involved could take action to improve the situation. I am not saying that they will have to do that, but I can see that sometimes there is a need for them to do so, and that would benefit the public. By introducing a restriction on such workers, we put the public at risk.

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. It is not only workers who can be involved in accidents. Last weekend, two young children in my constituency got on to British Rail property and were electrocuted by touching the overhead line. The question now is whether British Rail was negligent, but that has to be established. However, my hon. Friend is right: had an employee taken action to protect those young children, he would have acted in a socially responsible way but, without the addition of the new clauses, it would have put him outside the provisions of the Bill.

Amendment (a), tabled by the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel), to new clause 1 seeks to extend the scope of the new clause. It provides for recourse to an industrial tribunal if "the employee or employees were genuinely unaware of action being taken by their trade union to try and resolve the dispute."

There is merit in the amendment. It is a reasonable defence. If the Minister were to say that he is prepared to accept the new clause but not the amendment, we should have to reconsider our position. However, I hope that the Minister will recognise the logic of accepting both new clause 1 and amendment (a).

The Minister of State, Department of Employment (Mr. Tim Eggar): On Second Reading and in Committee we made it clear that we accept some of the concerns that have led to the tabling of the new clauses and their related amendments, since they are inspired by a genuine desire to ensure that health and safety standards at workplaces are maintained or improved. The Government fully share that aim. We would not propose legislation that we believed would in any way undermine those standards. We are totally committed to the health and safety arrangements that have been established by law. It is a non-partisan matter. We agree entirely that nothing should put those arrangements at risk.

A degree of common ground should exist and, I believe, does exist over health and safety matters. The Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974, governing health and safety matters, was drawn up by a former Conservative Government and enacted by a subsequent Labour Government. The Act placed the prime responsibility for health and safety fairly and squarely on the shoulders of employers, with the co-operation of their employees. That legislation was rightly recognised to be a milestone in helping to secure and improve health and safety standards in this country, and it is generally well regarded internationally.

The Act is kept under review by the tripartite Health and Safety Commission, which can propose improvements if it decides that they are needed. It is, and will continue to be, unlawful to work or to be asked to work in unsafe conditions. No employee, by definition, can be required by his employer to do something unlawful. The Bill does absolutely nothing to change that. At times in Committee, and during the hon. Gentleman's speech, it was implied that the effect and purpose of the Bill was to undermine the high standards for health and safety standards at work. That is not the case.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The Minister has uttered fine words about the 1974 Act. He says that he appreciates the concern expressed by the Opposition, particularly in Committee. Will he accept the intention behind one of the amendments and incorporate it in clause 7? If he does not accept the intention which underlines one of the amendments—the Minister can choose which one to accept—his fine words will be meaningless, and events in the next two years, as cases come to light, will show that his words were meaningless.

Mr. Eggar: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will bear with me as I hope to deal with the effect of the new clauses. These are serious and difficult matters. I hope that, by the time I sit down, I shall have explained to the hon. Gentleman why the Government have difficulty with the proposals.

The issue debated in Committee was technical—whether simple refusal to do unsafe work could be regarded as taking industrial action. We have considered that question carefully, and our conclusion is clear and unequivocal. The Government are absolutely confident that no court or tribunal has found, or would find, that simple refusal to do unsafe work amounts to taking industrial action. It follows that, if an employee simply refuses to do work that he believes to be unsafe and is dismissed, an industrial tribunal has, and will continue to have, jurisdiction to determine whether that dismissal was fair or unfair.

The legislation on unfair dismissal was enacted by the last Labour Government. That legislation, which made the dismissal of strikers fair in certain circumstances, made no special provision for refusal to work on grounds of health and safety. If there was no need for such a provision then, there is no need now.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Leaving aside the last Employment Bill, now an Act, that made provision for deposits to get into the industrial tribunal system, industrial tribunals cannot order a company to take a worker back into employment. If a worker knows that, although he can find his way through the maze of industrial tribunal legislation he will not get his job back, he will still knuckle under, believing that he must do as he is told if he is to keep his job. That is happening now on the Channel tunnel project.

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman is not dealing with the point at issue, which has been discussed at some length —whether simple refusal to do work in unsafe conditions amounts to industrial action. That is a critical question. If it is held to be industrial action, the Bill will affect the right of referral to industrial tribunals. If—as is our position —a simple refusal to do work is not industrial action, the position will be as it has always been and it will be totally unaffected by the Bill.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: The Minister has chosen his words carefully. He says that he is sure that a simple refusal to do work would not constitute industrial action. That, as he knows, is a contentious statement. There are those who disagree with his view. As there is doubt, it is incumbent on the Minister to ensure that the law says precisely what he claims that it says. He ought not to allow the matter ultimately to be tested in the courts.

The Minister must also define what he means by simple refusal. For example, would an overtime ban in support of a health and safety measure constitute simple refusal to do work, or would it constitute industrial action? The overwhelming legal opinion is that it would constitute industrial action. If the Minister is saying that in those circumstances he believes that people should lose their jobs, he should make it clear at the Dispatch Box.

Mr. Eggar: The case that the hon. Gentleman has postulated would have to be decided on the facts. He quoted the Faust case, but the Faust judgment made it clear that people would know industrial action when they saw it—in other words, it would have to be decided on the facts.

Mr. Wallace: My point follows the question raised by the hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd). Is not the effect of not accepting the amendments and not clarifying the position to put another barrier in the way of an employee who is dismissed and who then has to take the case to a tribunal to determine, first, whether the tribunal has jurisdiction before it can decide the fairness or unfairness of the dismissal? The fact that the law as it stands gives the tribunal no automatic jurisdiction must be a disincentive to test the system. I know that the Minister's concern about health and safety at work is genuine, but the Government would lose nothing by accepting the new clause, at least in principle, and getting rid of the doubt.

Mr. Eggar: I hope that the House will forgive me if I do not give way again. That is not meant in any way as a discourtesy, but I am aware of the time. I hope that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) will bear with me as I develop the argument.

In practice, the difficulty revolves around the problem of how one defines industrial action. It has been the view of successive Governments—the last Labour Government and the present Government—that it is extremely difficult to define industrial action and that the best solution is to leave it to industrial tribunals, and if necessary the Court of Appeal, to decide in the light of the facts of any particular case. I understand the appeal of seeking to define industrial action and we have considered the matter in considerable detail, but we do not believe that it is necessarily the right course.

Mr. Blair: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Eggar: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, but I said that I would not give way again. I hope that he will have a chance to make his point, and I shall be happy to answer it.

It is far from obvious that simply stopping work is always the right course for an employee who genuinely believes that working conditions are unsafe. Except in a minority of cases in which there is or is believed to be some real, immediate and serious risk of personal injury, there are other options—for example, employees can take matters up with their local health and safety inspector.

The hon. Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) referred to a conflict of legal views. Earlier this afternoon, the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) was kind enough to let me have a legal opinion. I do not consider that that strengthens his case. If he looks at the questions that were asked of learned counsel in that opinion, he will realise that he asked the wrong questions. Question 3 relates to industrial action, but the issue is whether a simple refusal to carry out unsafe work constitutes industrial action. I can only recommend that Opposition Members read the first page of that opinion and the third question that was asked. They will find that they asked the wrong question. It is not surprising that, the wrong question having been asked, the answer does not address the issue before the House—that is, whether a simple refusal to work on health and safety grounds constitutes industrial action. Our view is that it does not.

Mr. Blair: We have to clarify that. After all, most hon. Members consider that if there is a serious difference, the sensible course would be to remove any area of doubt instead of leaving it to someone to go to a tribunal some time later. Our adviser was asked whether a stoppage of work for health and safety reasons would constitute unofficial industrial action, and the answer was that it would be unofficial industrial action irrespective of the reasons or motivation behind the stoppage.

Mr. Eggar: That exactly proves my point. That is not the question at issue between us. I am perplexed that the hon. Gentleman has not yet focused on whether a simple refusal to carry out unsafe work would be industrial action. Our view—it was clearly and explicitly stated in Committee and I have explained the matter to the hon. Gentleman in person—is that a simple refusal to do unsafe work would not be industrial action. That is the issue that we have been debating.

Mr. John Evans: Will the Minister give way on that point?

Mr. Eggar: No. I must address the new clauses and amendments proposed by the Opposition.

The new clauses and amendments go well beyond the essentially technical issues discussed in Committee. As I have already said, a simple refusal to work in unsafe conditions will not make employees liable to selective dismissal without the right to have a tribunal determine the unfairness of any such dismissal, but new clause 1 and amendments Nos. 19 and 24 seek to go very much further. In a nutshell, those Opposition amendments and new clauses seek to carve out some special protection for unofficial strikers, and the net result would be a charter for unofficial action.

New clause 1 gives the game away by stating that industrial tribunal jurisdiction to determine the fairness of dismissal is to remain even if unofficial strikers are selectively dismissed for taking action about other matters.

Clearly, that goes well beyond health and safety concerns, and the hon. Gentleman recognises that.

Amendments Nos. 19 and 24 would undermine the intended effect of clause 7, as they would allow any unofficial striker who was selectively dismissed to get round the law simply by claiming that he had some health and safety concern. New clause 4 would mean that any employee who refused to work and subsequently claimed that he considered his work to be unsafe would have a right not to be selectively dismissed. That would apply even if it were patently obvious that the employee was taking industrial action, even if it was unofficial action, at the time of his dismissal. In other words, the amendments —individually or collectively—would drive a coach and horses through the present law on dismissal, let alone the new law on unofficial action in clause 7.

Similarly, new clauses 7 and 8 seek to upset the well established and effective balance of responsibility set out in the Health and Safety At Work, etc. Act 1974. Those new clauses would unduly direct responsibility away from employers and employees and on to inspectors, which would seriously damage the effectiveness of inspectors in ensuring compliance with health and safety law.

We believe that health and safety problems should be resolved by employers, who have the primary legal responsibility in co-operation with the employees who may be affected. Leaving everything to be decided by the inspectors, as is proposed, would remove the employers' incentive to assess and deal with workplace risks. If employers do not deal satisfactorily with health and safety problems, employees are and will remain free to contact their local health and safety inspector—in confidence, if they feel that that is appropriate. I need not remind the House that inspectors can visit without warning and can order work to be stopped if there is a risk of serious injury.

A proliferation of committees, as proposed by new clause 8, would not work in this role, and such committees would inevitably conflict with the joint committees, statutory and voluntary, which already exist to monitor health and safety measures in individual workplaces.

The key points of our concern about the new clauses and amendment No. 19 are that it is, and will continue to be, unlawful to work or to be asked to work in unsafe conditions, and no employee can be required by his employer to do something unlawful. If an employee simply refused to do work that he believed to be unsafe, he would not be taking industrial action. Thus, an industrial tribunal would have jurisdiction to determine whether dismissal was fair or unfair.

No court and no tribunal has ever found that simple refusal to do unsafe work amounts to industrial action. Legislation on unfair dismissal enacted by the last Labour Government which made dismissal of strikers fair made no special provision for refusal to work on grounds of health and safety.

This has been a useful exchange on a complicated and technical matter. I remain convinced that there is nothing incompatible between our commitment to maintaining high health and safety standards and the measures in the Bill to provide effective remedies and to deter unofficial industrial action.

6.30 pm

Mr. John Evans: The Opposition amendments seek only to ameliorate the impact of clause 7. Like my hon. Friends, I regard the amendments in the name of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) as helpful and I support them.

This is an obnoxious Bill, and clause 7 is the offensive part of it. Indeed, the measures that the Government are introducing are the type of trade union legislation that is being swept away by eastern European countries as they find their freedom. The Minister knows as well as I do that legislation of this type was inflicted on the workers by dictator Ceausescu of Romania and is being cast aside as the Romanian people attain freedom.

Clause 7 would remove the right of workers participating in any unofficial action to appeal to a tribunal on the ground of unfair dismissal. It would also remove their statutory rights to, for example, redundancy payments and pregnancy leave. The Government have become muddled. They continually confuse unofficial strikes with unofficial action. The Green Paper entitled "Unofficial Action and The Law" referred in paragraphs 1.2, 1.3, 1.5 and 1.14 to unofficial strikes and unofficial action in almost the same breath.

Hon. Members, particularly on the Opposition Benches, with experience of industrial affairs will be aware that unofficial strikes are generally spontaneous acts, such as walking off the job, whereas unofficial action can take a variety of forms, including a sit-down strike, a ban on overtime, a work to rule or a refusal to work in dangerous or unsafe places, with unsafe tools and equipment or with unsafe or dangerous materials and substances.

I am particularly worried to note that a senior Minister believes that no worker in Britain is ever asked to work in unsafe conditions or with unsafe tools or materials and that no arguments ever occur over such matters. I assure him, having spent my working life in shipyards and ship repair yards—the Minister seems to be indicating dissent; he has never worked in such places—that people do work in conditions that are highly dangerous and often unsafe.

The weakness in the Minister's argument lies in the question of who is to decide when there is a dispute between the work force and the employer over whether a practice, tool or substance is safe or dangerous. Frequently in those circumstances the argument is resolved by the workers simply walking away from the material or job.

I am particularly worried about a situation that occurs frequently. When asbestos is found in a place of work where, for example, maintenance work is being undertaken, any worker would immediately walk off that job. Irrespective of the assurances given by the Minister, a worker taking such a step would immediately be at risk of losing his job because of the way in which clause 7 is drafted.

That clause enables the employer to choose who to dismiss, and, once dismissed under the terms of clause 7, the employee would have no right to go to a tribunal. A tribunal would not have jurisdiction in such a case. The worker would have been dismissed because he participated in industrial action, and the clause makes it clear that a tribunal would have no jurisdiction in that case. As I said in an intervention, the Minister could remove all our fears by including a provision, similar to that which we recommend in our amendments, relating to health and safety.

We appreciate that the best employers would never find themselves in such a situation, but there are rogue employers who might push workers in certain directions and who in some circumstances would be prepared to do so provocatively, seeking to create a confrontation. That would give an employer the opportunity to sack, for example, shop stewards or people with long service and considerable redundancy rights. An employer would have the right to get rid of pregnant women, who would then lose any rights that had accrued to them. One can envisage circumstances in which companies in financial difficulty would take action to reduce their compensation liabilities.

Is it fair or just that workers should be put at risk in such circumstances? Opposition Members have done their best to concentrate their remarks on health and safety issues, although many other subjects could be discussed as we debate clause 7.

The Minister repeated what the Under-Secretary of State said in Committee:

"To reassure Opposition Members, I have tried to find out whether, since the unfair dismissal legislation was first introduced in 1971, there have been any recorded cases of industrial action being taken solely on the grounds of health and safety that have led to people being dismissed. Inevitably, it is rather hard to prove a negative, but I have found no instance of it".—[Official Report, Standing Committee D, 15 March 1990; c. 353.]

That is hardly surprising because until now, the individuals concerned would have had the right to appeal to a tribunal on the ground of unfair dismissal. Any employer, even a rogue employer, would have known that he would be derided and laughed out of court the moment it was recognised that health and safety was the issue.

Unless the Minister amends the legislation, either here or in another place, to protect workers by statute in health and safety cases, clause 7 will cause the Government considerable problems. The clause is specific. Any individual taking part in unofficial industrial action immediately exposes himself to selective dismissal. That will happen, as the Minister knows. I only hope that in the Lobbies tonight, Tory Members know what they are voting for.

Mr. David Madel (Bedfordshire, South-West): I wish to address my remarks to amendment (a) to new clause 1 and amendment (a) to new clause 4. I assume that my hon. Friend the Minister will have a few words to say about them. He said that there had been an interesting exchange: Front-Bench Members may have had an interesting exchange, but we are only now getting going on the group of amendments. I shall not take up too much time, as I am conscious that other hon. Members wish to speak.

New clause 1 states:

"An industrial tribunal shall have jurisdiction to entertain a claim for unfair dismissal".

That does not necessarily mean that such a claim would be successful. If new clause 1 is passed with amendment (a) tacked on to it, industrial tribunals will take on a somewhat new role with a pre-hearing capacity. However, there is nothing strange or unusual about changing the nature and function of industrial tribunals.

Industrial tribunals have been with us since 1964. There was a major change in 1971 and there may be major changes in the future. The first advantage of accepting amendment (a) would be that there would be encouragement for trade unions to get closer to their members if unofficial strike action was taken. Amendment (a) is designed to try to stop unofficial action getting out of control and to reduce to the bare minimum the danger of misunderstandings between trade unions and their members. It is also designed to encourage trade unions to intervene quickly and to let their members know that they are so intervening if unofficial action takes place or if it appears to members of the trade union that a grievance has not been dealt with quickly. It is also designed to try to put a brake on rash and hasty decisions by management which could occur if the Bill is passed unamended.

I do not wish to rehearse all the arguments that I made in Committee. I have already drawn attention to the wording that must be used in the letter from a trade union to its members. I remain opposed to the way in which the words are written down, and to their tone and content. The letter must say:

"Your union has repudiated any call for industrial action . . . If you are dismissed . . . you will have no right to complain of unfair dismissal."

That is not the language of industrial relations in the 1990s. It is too far removed from reality and too much like first world war generals barking orders to those on the ground. It would have been perfectly possible to change those words and still put the onus on the trade unions to intervene quickly to settle the grievance and on those taking unofficial action to cease taking it while the trade union tried to sort out the problem.

The most serious problem about new clause 1 is that it would take away the right of an individual to go to an industrial tribunal and for his case at least to be heard. In the often confused situation of an unofficial strike, there may be sudden dismissal of one or two people. To take away the right for a case to be looked at is neither reasonable nor correct. The Government have lost a sense of balance on the matter. I urge them to accept amendment (a) or to draft a provision similar to it in the other place.

6.45 pm

New clause 4, as at present drafted, could lead to misunderstandings, and it gives a great deal of freedom to the individual employee. It uses the words:

"which the said employee considers to be dangerous to his health".

It is common sense that we should put on some brake before people walk off the job because they consider the conditions to be unsafe.

The channel tunnel and the accidents there have already been mentioned and the Opposition have already said that they propose to raise the matter further. Amendment (a) would lead to an avoidance of unnecessary confrontations between management and unions on the most important aspect of work—health and safety conditions. Under new clause 4, unofficial action would still be possible. The new clause could refer not only to one, but to two or three people whose selective dismissal could lead to widespread unofficial industrial action, and matters could soon become out of control.

Amendment (a) is designed to achieve three objectives. First, it is designed to ensure that when there is an argument between employers and employees about safety at work, the advice of the Health and Safety Executive must be sought at once. That does not mean that the employer necessarily has to accept its advice, although it is hard to imagine that, if there was clear advice that the conditions were unsafe, an employer would be likely to brush aside the advice of the Health and Safety Executive. For that reason, it would be up to the employer to say to the employee, "You are dissatisfied and you consider that the working conditions are dangerous—I am seeking the advice of the Health and Safety Executive now and I expect that there will then be tripartite discussions between the Health and Safety Executive, the employer and the employee."

Secondly, amendment (a) would give greater reassurance to employees who feel that they may be working in dangerous conditions that their anxieties would be dealt with quickly. Again, that would calm down industrial relations and give individual employees a greater sense of security in their work. Thirdly, amendment (a) is relevant to young people in their first job. Such people are reluctant to start an argument with an employer about whether conditions are safe or not.

Amendment (a) would give greater protection to young employees. It would also give greater protection to female employees who might be equally unwilling and afraid to start an argument with an employer about safety conditions at work. More and more employers are seeking more and more women employees today. With the change to separate taxation, more women will seek employment. That puts an extra responsibility on Parliament to ensure that the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 is carried out properly and that there is no deterrent for women employees if they are concerned about conditions at work.

Science and technology change all the time. New substances constantly appear and there is a whole mass of information on new substances at work. Again, that could lead to somebody saying, "I am sorry, I am not satisfied with the handling of this substance—I must ask that the Health and Safety Executive look at it before I go on with my work." Amendment (a) to new clause 4 would strengthen the Health and Safety Executive and health and safety committees. It would make employers go into more detail in their annual reports about what they had done about health and safety conditions, which would be all to the good. It would also improve contact between management and employees about a vitally important part of industrial relations.

I have tried to turn a stumbling block into a stepping stone towards better industrial relations. I hope that Ministers will accept the amendments, but if they do not, it will be one of those days on which I must disagree with the Front Bench. The Conservative party is a centre-right coalition—a broad Church—and if there are disagreements between Conservative Members, that is par for the course and something which sometimes happens in Parliament.

My amendments seek to clarify the position for individual employees. We should reduce the danger of misunderstandings at work to a minimum, as they can lead to unofficial industrial action, and once that starts it is difficult to control.

Mr. Leighton: It is a great pleasure to follow such a thoughtful speech as that of the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel). I thought that my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) made a persuasive case for the new clause. I also congratulate my hon. Friends on the first-class job that they did in Committee.

If employees find that they are in danger and take certain actions, are they protected? I have heard what the Minister has said, and the different legal opinions. At best, this is a grey area: the reasons why employees had taken certain actions could be disputed. For example, an employer could say that they had acted for one reason, while they could say that they had acted for health and safety reasons. Who is to decide?

The new clause says that an industrial tribunal should have jurisdiction to decide whether those employees had a genuine and reasonable belief. Surely that could be accepted by the House for the avoidance of doubt, for it would make matters clear to everyone. If the Minister accepts that people in such circumstances should have the right to a defence, why does he oppose the new clause?

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) has said that, in his experience, disputes often blow up unexpectedly. I could cite an example from my own experience. In a previous incarnation, I was a health and safety representative on a national newspaper. I was a member of the mechanical committee, on which there were trade union and management representatives. It did not deal with pay or conditions; it dealt with the state of the machinery, and with such things as the ventilation system.

On one occasion, we had a problem with the plates on a machine. Hon. Members will be familiar with the term "hot metal"; in those days there were hot metal plates on rotary presses, made of lead and other metals. The problem occurred when the plates started to break up on the print run. That was dangerous, as the plates were clamped on to the cylinders of high-speed rotary machines. If the plates broke, the centrifugal force sent the pieces of metal flying like shrapnel. As hon. Members can imagine, it was extremely dangerous.

The technical director did not know why the plates were breaking up. Tests were made, and he genuinely tried to find out the answer. We worked at night; he worked during the day, and at night was lucky enough to be in bed. He said that if the problem recurred we should shut down the unit on the press and not touch it until he returned in the morning, so that he could investigate what had happened.

There were many units on the press, including spare units. One night, as I was sitting in my office, I had a message that a plate had broken up again. I went to the machine room and told the machine operators that they were not to touch the unit, but to leave it until the technical director returned in the morning to examine it. However, a new junior member of the management came on to the scene and told the men to strip the unit, to put another load of plates on to the same unit and to continue with the job. I told him to hang on: we were following the technical director's instructions and leaving the unit as it was. He then got stroppy, and told us to get the unit stripped and to put new plates on.

Obviously we were in something of a dilemma, but the machine operators did as I had suggested. The junior manager took umbrage, saying that we were to finish for the night and that there would be no paper. He then stormed off. I chatted with the men and we decided that his reaction had been over the top and silly, and we produced the paper that night without any management. We got on better than usual, as there was no harassment from management—we had discovered that they were not really necessary. We even produced the paper for a second night. The Daily Telegraph published an article about the dispute, but it could not understand that we were taking what was considered to be industrial action—although we were continuing to work—for reasons of health and safety rather than money.

I have no doubt that there are many incidents such as the one I have referred to. I shall not mention the channel tunnel—although others may—as the Select Committee will take evidence on the matter. Such circumstances could arise at any time, and the workers should have the appropriate security and protection. The Minister agrees with that in principle, but the position is indeterminate. New clause 1 would provide the clarity that we need. People who decline to work in dangerous conditions should be protected. The Government should accept the new clause, or explain why not.

Mr. Wallace: My speech follows the remarks of the hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) —the distinguished Chairman of the Select Committee on Employment—who expressed misgivings about clause 7. The speeches of the hon. Members for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) and for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) showed that hon. Members on both sides of the House feel that clause 7—the effects of which the new clause tries to mitigate—is serious, as it goes to the heart of individual rights. When I examined the Bill before it went into Committee, my initial reaction was that it was not worth trying to amend it, as that would give it some respectability. I considered it fundamentally unjust and unfair. However, some effort must be made to mitigate its effect.

Questions of health and safety dominated our Committee debates, and I believe that new clauses 1 and 4 and the amendments of the hon. Member for St. Helens, North have tried to address the matter. Without some mitigation, we have what is tantamount to a victimisers' charter. The hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West drew some parallels with first world war generals in the way that clause 7 is drafted.

The scenes that I fear are more reminiscent of the second world war. One can imagine an unscrupulous employer faced with unofficial action saying, "I shall select five workers at random each week and dismiss them unless you go back to work." The Bill opens up such opportunities to unscrupulous employers.

The Minister has been generous in giving way, but he has not shown that he has grasped our argument. I believe that he genuinely wants improvements to be made in health and safety, but he did not say anything to suggest that he would take action to give substance to that desire. He seemed also to think that we were talking about defining what is and what is not an industrial dispute. If that were so, one could imagine a tribunal having to decide whether an industrial dispute was taking place on matters quite unrelated to health and safety. That may well happen, but we are talking about cases in which it is beyond doubt that an industrial dispute has been occasioned by the fact that employees are no longer prepared to stand for circumstances that they believe put their health and safety at risk.

We are not talking about one individual who—to use the Minister's words—simply refuses to do something because a health and safety issue has arisen; we are talking about circumstances in which a group of employees in a workplace have been becoming more and more frustrated over a period of weeks, or perhaps months, with what they regard as their employer's failure to observe health and safety regulations. One incident may spark off that collective action. That is the sort of action that Opposition Members and, I think, the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel), are trying to address. We are talking about employees using collective action to pressurise their employer to come up to scratch and provide decent safe conditions in the workplace.

The Minister argued that the provision might open up a can of worms—a large loophole. With respect, he does not seem to have considered in detail the terms of new clause 1, which demands that the employee has "a genuine and reasonable belief" that the employer was acting in breach of his statutory duty. Clearly, if a spurious belief were used to try to justify unofficial action, that would not be covered by the new clause, as the test that it involves is a demanding one.

The Minister also said that the new clause had a sting in its tale because the words

"other matters connected with the terms and conditions of the employees of the employer" could refer to so many other matters. But that phrase does not stand on its own. The new clause refers to a breach or perceived breach of statutory duty with regard to terms and conditions of employment. We are not, therefore, talking about any other matter. The definition is a narrow one. If the Minister wishes to give substance to his oft-repeated claim to be genuinely interested in health and safety, he should accept that this is one very narrow area and that those who participate in unofficial industrial action from the best motives connected with their own health and safety should not be subjected to possible victimisation by an unscrupulous employer.

Mr. Cryer: I shall be brief, because I know that we have a number of other subjects to cover.

New clause 1 has extremely modest aims and ambitions and any reasonable Government would accept it, but I shall speak principally in support of new clauses 7 and 8, which concern the right of workers to call in a health and safety inspector if they believe that safety standards are being jeopardised and to obtain that inspector's approval of the safety standards of the operation before the work recommences. That is an eminently reasonable request, as any serious and objective study would recognise.

If I said that 413 people had been killed in nine years as a result of terrorist outrages, the House would be crowded, there would be expressions of horror and the Government would be agreeing to introduce legislation to prevent a recurrence. But 413 people in the mines and quarries industry died between 1979 and 1988. Each year, accidents take their toll of life and limb, and several thousand people are seriously injured. If workers had the right to question safety standards and to take action if they thought that those standards were being prejudiced, many of those fatalities would have been avoided.

Let me give an example. Scotch derrick cranes have been used extensively in quarries. They have fixed jibs. The Health and Safety Executive sent round a note saying that, if the pull holding the drum was made of cast iron, it should be replaced by a steel pull, because cast iron breaks. At Hungergantick quarry, the pulls were not replaced as had been recommended. The inspector from an insurance company could not tell the difference between steel and cast iron. One fateful morning, two workers got into the bucket and were lowered halfway down a quarry face. The pull broke, they plunged to the bottom and both were killed. Perhaps the workers would not have known about the difference between steel and cast iron, but they probably would.

The crane was not well maintained. In works operations, people are always pressing maintenance men to do odd jobs and get things working. If the workers had had the right outlined in the new clauses, it is likely that that Scotch derrick crane would have been properly maintained, according to the requirement that the HSE had circulated to employers. Accidents of that sort could be avoided. We should realise that people who operate cranes or other dangerous machinery and who are lowered halfway down a quarry face or into the bowels of a mine in the course of their duties will have safety at the forefront of their minds, because they are the people who will be imperilled most if there are hazards at work.

The Government are obsessed with trade unions, and the Bill contains many provisions dealing with balloting. But every year, bar exceptional years, we lose more working days as a result of industrial injury than from strike action. That being so, why do not the Government do something about the daily toll taken on life and limb and reduce the number of days lost through industrial injury?

I should like to draw the House's attention to some peculiarities and to emphasise the fact that new clauses 7 and 8 might do something to hurry up the production of clearer standards. For many years, there have been discrepancies between the lifting of heavy weights regulations in the wool textile industry and in agriculture. For agricultural workers, the limit is 175 lb but for textile workers it is only 120 lb. That is absurd. Agricultural workers cannot necessarily lift heavier weights than textile workers, but that is the implication that the regulations carry. Other workers have to lift more reasonable weights.

In 1976, the then chairman of the Health and Safety Commission assured me that the commission would be producing guidance on manual handling. That guidance is still awaited. If workers who daily have to lift heavy castings off a production line had the power to question safety standards and seek the assistance of health and safety inspectors, we might get some sense out of the arrangements and improve the regulations—and there are not many—that have been crying out for reform for many years.

I should like to give the Minister some figures. In the nine months commencing 1 April in the year 1986-87, almost 30,000 people were off work for three or more days because of back injuries. For the same period in 1987-88, the figure was 30,002 and in 1988-89 it was 29,783. If we take an average full year, the figure for 1979 was 44,000; for 1980 it was 37,000; for 1981 it was 74,000; and for 1982 it was 66,000. I stress that I am talking about thousands of people being affected by serious injury.

If we are serious about health and safety at work, we should give people the right to plead in an industrial tribunal that the reason for their course of action was the lack of decent health and safety standards. However, I would go further than that. I would give people the right to say, "We believe that these health and safety standards are not safe and we should like to call in a health and safety inspector to ascertain whether or not they are safe." Most decent employers would endorse that because most decent employers want proper standards of health and safety at work because they know that poor standards lead to all sorts of problems such as bad industrial relations and insurance companies wanting information when claims are made. It is a nightmare when serious industrial injuries occur.

Therefore, I urge the Minister seriously to consider the new clauses and, even if he cannot accept them now, to have a word with his colleagues to ensure that amendments to their effect are tabled in another place.

Mr. Nellist: Unusual though this may seem, I fully agree with the opening remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans), not only that this is an odious Bill, but that clause 7, which the Opposition amendments and new clauses seek to amend, is probably the worst aspect. That is why, during this Report stage, I am restricting my comments to this matter although I am no stranger to the Committee stages of the Employment Acts that the House has considered in past years.

The Bill is anti-working-class and anti-trade-union. It is designed to restrict the ability of trade unions to do the job that they were set up to do, which is to defend the rights and working conditions of their members and, through them, of their members' families.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) that the new clauses represent the minimum. It was wrong of the Minister to try to dismiss them as unworthy of consideration. I repeat that they represent the minimum that the House should accept on this matter.

I should have preferred the House to debate stronger moves tonight. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South seemed about to suggest that workers should have a legal right to stop unsafe jobs without having to worry about whether they were taking unofficial or official action and about whether they could or could not use an industrial tribunal. I believe that the legal right to stop an unsafe or dangerous job should be enshrined in our legislation but, unfortunately, that is not the road down which we are travelling.

I also wish that we were talking about the mandatory use of prison sentences for employers or directors who are found to have been grossly negligent after a death or serious injury has occurred. I raised those points with the Prime Minister last Thursday but characteristically, she ignored them. As a result, 40 of my hon. Friends and I have tabled our points in early-day motion 969.

I rise to speak on this group of amendments and new clauses especially because of the renewed interest in health and safety in recent days following the tragic death 10 days ago of Billy Cartman at the channel tunnel site. That death and that site encapsulate much of what is wrong with this country's health and safety legislation, especially in relation to construction sites. It is not only I who think that—the Health and Safety Executive has estimated that working on the channel tunnel is three times more dangerous even than working on a building site, and building sites are bad enough.

The House and working people outside the House rightly get angry when a Piper Alpha, a Zeebrugge or a King's Cross occurs. We rightly feel anger about the tragic and useless waste of life in those major incidents and accidents. Yet the same number of people—about 160—are killed every year in the construction industry, but because the loss of life is diffuse, spread over the year and not concentrated in one incident, if does not attract the same attention.

Therefore, I make no apology for speaking in these terms. It is not as though I have previously been accused of shroud-waving in the House. That is why I say that perhaps the only good that can come from useless and tragic accidents, such as the recent accident at the channel tunnel site, is that the minds of the people who should be in a position to do something about that—the legislators in this place—are concentrated wonderfully, albeit briefly.

7.15 pm

There have already been six deaths on our side of the channel tunnel and three on the other side. As I said last Thursday, that is almost a man per mile. Like others outside the House, especially those who have to work on the channel tunnel, I believe that the workers there are being asked to work far too fast and far too hard because of the escalating cost of the project. The contractors have received warnings in the past, but it took that sixth death before the Secretary of State for Employment called in the senior management of Transmanche Link.

I tabled a written question a few days ago about the outcome of that meeting with Jack Lemley, the chief executive of TML. The Minister on the Treasury Bench now, the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), answered on behalf of the Secretary of State that Jack Lemley had assured the Secretary of State "that the highest priority would be given to ensuring the health and safety of workers employed on the construction of the channel tunnel".

That answer does not sit easy with other reports. I could quote interviews reported in Militant with channel tunnel workers who do not wish to be named, but instead I will quote from a newspaper which is such that, I hope, even Conservative Members will not accuse me of choosing partial sources of information. I refer to The Independent of Wednesday 9 May. The workers interviewed by that newspaper refused to give their names precisely because of the clauses that we are debating and the fear that they might be dismissed for raising such points. The Independent reported workers as saying:

"'It's push, push, push all the time.'

Staff allege that: locomotives used in construction were regularly derailed; fires underground often went unreported; visibility in many areas was dangerously low; carbon dioxide fumes often rose above safe levels; injured men, including workers with broken legs, were left untreated at the tunnel face until the shift ended and workers who complained about lack of safety were threatened with disciplinary action or demoted to lower-paid work.

One locomotive driver who refused to drive over a section of track which he felt would derail his train was sent out of the marine tunnel south and restricted to working in the service tunnel. 'You're not allowed to complain. If you complain, you're out. It's like being in a military camp, you do what you're told,' he said."

That is the sort of atmosphere that has been engendered in some construction projects, especially in the south-east where, because of the pressure of escalating costs and profit margins being ever tighter, the work is push, push, push. That is the atmosphere that the new clauses seek to address. They seek to give workers a safety net so that they can escape the sword of Damocles hanging about them and the fear that they can be dismissed for having taken what can be described as "unofficial action" if they complain about health and safety matters.

Notwithstanding what the Minister has said, I have spoken to people who have campaigned both at the channel tunnel and elsewhere, such as in my own region of the midlands, and know workers who are afraid to put their heads above the parapet. One reason is that there are people and firms in the construction industry who are heavily involved in and are financing bodies such as the Economic League, which keep lists of workers who complain. Then, when they are dismissed—usually on the pretext of being late for work or for some other reason unconnected with health and safety matters—they are unable to get another job.

I shall limit my remarks because other hon. Members wish to speak and other issues need to be raised before we complete our consideration of the Bill today. It is no good the Minister saying that there are mechanisms such as fines to deal with breaches of health and safety rules. The five TML companies have been fined a maximum of £10,000 each for one death which occurred last February and were previously each fined £1,700. That does not concentrate the minds of directors of companies which are making millions of pounds of profit, but a prison sentence of between six and 24 months, if not longer, would certainly do so. The prospect of a prison sentence at the end of their tunnel if gross negligence was proved might lead directors to take their jobs more seriously and concentrate their minds on health and safety matters.

The Minister and other Conservative Members have said that the aim of their provisions is to limit unofficial action. I warn the Minister that such is the mood among many construction and other workers in dangerous jobs that I can foresee a time—it may well be this year—when there will be a one-day strike about health and safety issues on projects such as the channel tunnel. It may well be an unofficial strike—I do not think that workers will worry about that if so many of them take part, and they will certainly have the widespread support of other workers in other trade unions around the country.

The Minister has the chance today to prevent such things from happening. He should accept the minimal demands of my hon. Friends and our new clauses. If he does not, that will be on his conscience. He will know that he could have done something today to prevent the loss of life and limb and to avert the need for action, official or unofficial, in protest at the carnage occurring in industry today.

Dr. Kim Howells (Pontypridd): I wished to make many points in the debate tonight, but I shall not make them all because there are restrictions on time, which I understand.

I wish to take up the Minister on what I consider to be some bland statements that he made about the way in which industrial law as it stands will enable people to take cases to industrial tribunals. Like many people—on both sides of the House, I am sure—I come from industry. I know that the nuances, subtleties and interpretations of which he spoke earlier are so much hogwash. The day-to-day basis of most people's experience in industry is different. In my experience, when people try to defend themselves before industrial tribunals, the charge on which they have been dismssed from work is never a refusal to do a job because it is dangerous. The major charge is always different. The full force of the empoloyers' argument is always spent on undermining the employee's case that he or she did not wish to go into a dangerous place.

Health and safety has dogged industrial relations ever since industrial relations began. In industry we are often working on the frontiers of technology. Changes may occur which simply cannot be legislated for in a general way as the Bill attempts to do. I remember when roof bolting was introduced into pits. Men would say, "Those roof bolts are not safe." The employer believed that they were safe and time and again they would argue that experience in America showed that roof bolting was perfectly safe. I have no doubt that in many geological circumstances that is true. But to men venturing into dangerous areas of mines who were used to working under steel arches the sight of a coal face or area of a mine supported only by roof bolting militated against everything that they understood about mining safety.

When men refused to go into such areas, they were threatened with dismissal. That happened on many occasions. I know for a fact that that was used after the miners' strike as a means of getting rid of undesirable teams, as they were considered by management, in an era of industrial relations when fear stalked many pits and there was no sense of self-confidence about industrial relations.

The other extreme is areas where the dangers do not seem great, such as a large office where there may be people using computer visual display units. We are only now beginning to understand the effect on health and safety of working on VDUs. If people walk out of an office saying that they do not believe that their work is safe in the long term, who is to rule in favour of one party or another? Under the Bill it would constitute an unofficial action, a walk out, rag out, call it what one will.

Who is to say to workers in the nuclear industry, after the findings of the Gardiner report are published, that they must go into an area about which they harbour great fears even though they worked there previously? At the innovative edge of technology there will be many problems that the Bill does not address. There is no room for ambiguity or vague promises of interpretation or subtleties. Health and safety provision must be included in a way that people can understand. It must be simple enough for both employers and employees to understand. Employees must have confidence in the legislation. If not, the trade unions will lose another function—the policing of their own work forces. There will be a degree of anarchy in industry which neither employers nor trade unions want. I fear that the Government do not understand that point. We shall end up with worse industrial relations and health and safety than we have now.

Mr. Eggar: We have had a useful debate and I shall try to respond briefly to as many as possible of the points that have been raised.

I fully understand the anxieties of my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel). We cannot take employees' health and safety seriously enough. As I said in my opening remarks, that is common ground on both sides of the House. I certainly share my hon. Friend's wish that trade unions should do all that they can to resolve industrial disputes and get their members back to work. Trade unions should always have that objective in mind.

I entirely agree with my hon. Friend that employers should seek advice from the Health and Safety Executive whenever it may be helpful. In our view, his amendments would not achieve those common objectives, but we are prepared to consider whether the proposed words for the union's repudiation statement are the best and most apt in all circumstances. I know that that has been a matter of concern to him both on Second Reading and in Committee, and I assure him that we shall not close our minds on that issue.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) postulated an example of an industrial dispute. I am somewhat wary of following up such examples, because each case must be decided by an industrial tribunal. He postulated an example of a long-term health and safety worry, as did the hon. Member for Pontypridd

(Dr. Howells). If employees are worried about either imminent or long-term health and safety issues, they are always free to call in an inspector. As I said earlier, that can be done on a confidential basis if that is appropriate.

The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has had a long-running interest in health and safety regulations with regard to manual handling. We hope that all European Community member states will shortly agree unanimously a directive on manual handling. He will be interested to know that much of that directive is based on a consultative document issued by the Health and Safety Commission.

The hon. Members for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans) and for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) slightly misconstrued what we have said. We have never said that employees who take unofficial industrial action are protected against selective dismissal. The issue is whether there is any industrial action at all. If not—and we say that there is no industrial action where employees stop work because of fears for their safety—those dismissed have the right to complain of unfair dismissal. Their position will be the same as before the Bill.

In response to the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist), let me say that section 36 of the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974 provides for industrial managers and directors to be prosecuted for breaches of health and safety. Indeed, in certain circumstances, that Act allows for imprisonment. It is not correct to say that that section has never been applied. A company director was successfully prosecuted for manslaughter following the death of an employee in May 1988. He received a suspended prison term of two years.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton), the Chairman of the Select Committee on Employment, suggested that it might be appropriate to explore the root of an avoidance of doubt provision. We considered that in some detail, but we came to the conclusion that the present position was preferable. It is not something that we have simply overlooked. We have explored that possibility.

The hon. Members for Stretford and for Coventry, South-East asked about the situation on the channel tunnel. We are unaware of any industrial action about health and safety issues on the channel tunnel site. Although there is widespread anxiety about health and safety on the channel tunnel site, the precise area covered by the Bill has not arisen in that context. Rather than choosing his newspaper, Militant, the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East quoted from The Independent. I shall quote from The Independent on Sunday of 13 May, which quoted a senior TGWU shop steward as saying:

"The Channel tunnel site is well disciplined with an excellent industrial relations team and there is no evidence of production being put before safety."

Mr. Nellist: Will the Minister give way?

7.30 pm

Mr. Eggar: I will not give way. I gave way earlier to the hon. Gentleman.

We have had a useful debate on what is essentially a technical matter. The Government are every bit as committed to maintaining and improving health and safety at work as the Opposition. We are convinced that clause 7 does nothing to undermine the excellent health and safety record that the country has achieved as a result of the bipartisan policy following the Health and Safety at Work, etc. Act 1974.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Although this may be a technical issue for the Government, it is a matter of life and death for the people whom my hon. Friends and I and, indeed, Tory Members represent.

Whereas the Minister uses legalistic sophistry to argue whether action is industrial action, we are anxious that people should have a legitimate opportunity to withdraw their labour and protest in that form if their lives are threatened, for example, on the channel tunnel site. If the Minister accepts that they will be prevented from doing so by the provisions of the Bill, he fails to understand how dangerous working conditions are in the tunnel.

The Minister believes that there is something to be undermined in our wonderful health and safety structures. I remind him that his Government are underfunding the Health and Safety Executive to the extent that it is having to make cuts. They have consistently run down the executive so that it is unable to do the job that Parliament asks of it.

Mr. Eggar: That is a disgraceful comment.

Mr. Lloyd: I invite the Minister to have a debate on health and safety at any time in the House. We shall be delighted to put the Government on the spot.

Mr. Eggar rose——

Mr. Lloyd: The Minister will understand why I do not give way. He has had his say.

My hon. Friend the Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) was right in his comment about the construction industry. It has a terrible record. If the Minister believes that the position is satisfactory, and if his only defence is that one employer was given a suspended prison sentence, putting that forward as evidence that the law is applied, he does not understand that people are being seriously injured and killed at work. We will do everything that we can to prevent that.

As my hon. Friends have pointed out, we have tabled minimal new clauses and amendments to give the narrowest of protections to people at work. The fact that the Government are not prepared to accept even those minimal demands shows that they do not care about health and safety. For that reason, we shall vote for the new clause.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time.

Question accordingly negatived.

New Clause 2

REFUSAL OF EMPLOYMENT ON GROUNDS RELATED TO PREVIOUS TRADE UNION ACTIVITIES

'It shall be unlawful to refuse a person employment because of his trade union activities in any previous employment.'.—[Mr. Tony Lloyd.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, That the clause be read a Second Time.—[Mr. Tony Lloyd.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): With this it will be convenient to consider the following: new clause 3 —Refusal of employment to person on register kept by organisation compiling information about suitability of individuals for employment—

'Where there is an arrangement or practice under which an employer will not offer employment to a person whose name is on a register kept by an organisation which compiles information about people in connection with their suitability for employment and that information includes information about a person's trade union activity, then a person who is refused employment in pursuance of that arrangement or practice, shall be held to have been refused employment by reason of his trade union activities.'.

Amendment No. 20, in clause 1, page 1, line 12 at end add—

'(c) because without his knowledge his name has been supplied to his prospective employer by a third party from an unpublished or secret register'.

Amendment No. 21, in page 2, line 23, at end add—

'(e) offers, and then subsequently withdraws the offer of employment without giving a satisfactory explanation for the withdrawal of the offer of employment.'.

Amendment No. 22, in clause 2, page 2, line 40 at end add—

'(c) because without his knowledge his name has been supplied to the agency by a third party from an unpublished or secret register.'.

Mr. John P. Smith: It gives me great pleasure to speak to the new clauses and amendments, not least because they are good additions to what is not a constructive or good Bill for the current needs of our industrial relations. In the main, the new clauses are designed to outlaw the unacceptable practice adopted by British employers of blacklisting genuine and ordinary trade unionists. They are also a good test of the Government's sincerity when they claim equity and balance. Earlier in the debate a Conservative Member spoke about the need for a sense of balance.

Clauses 1 and 2 of the Bill seek to make it unlawful to discriminate against a potential employee whether or not he is a member of a trade union. Clause 2 states that, if an employment agency puts out an advertisement for a worker which says that the person appointed should be a member of a trade union, and if that person is subsequently refused employment, it can be deemed that he was refused employment because he refused to join or was not a member of a trade union.

In Committee, we argued that a distinction should be made between trade union membership and trade union activity. The Government repeatedly said that there was no need to do that because the two things were one and the same. We are again asking the Government to make that distinction and to ensure that quite sinister organisations, especially the Economic League, will not be at liberty to provide information about potential employees. Such information invariably includes details of trade union activity.

The Government see nothing wrong or contradictory in allowing the secret practices of that secret organisation to continue. In Committee we witnessed for the first time Ministers forcefully defending that organisation and its activities. I am sure that many of my colleagues will agree that that is disgraceful, because anybody who is aware of what that organisation does could not possibly support it in an open society.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): On a number of occasions over recent years, people from west Cumberland have come to my surgery and my home to complain that they have been blacklisted by local employers and contracting organisations—not only in west Cumberland, but on the Sellafield site. It is a disturbing development. Ministers must not look lightly on these serious matters. We need legislative reform because they are an invasion of our constituents' civil liberties. Ministers must not casually brush it aside.

Mr. Smith: I intend to refer to some of the practices of the Economic League that have resulted not only in people being blacklisted and therefore unable to obtain work, but in innocent people being blacklisted. Wrong information has been passed on about people and, consequently, they have been refused employment. We might never know the numbers involved, because the information is secret, but they could run into thousands or even tens of thousands. Ordinary working people and ordinary, respectable trade unionists involved in legitimate trade union activities, have had their lives ruined because the practices of the Economic League have prevented them from obtaining gainful employment.

Hon. Members may not be familiar with the practices of the Economic League. After all, for almost 60 years its work was conducted in secret. The league contacted members of the Committee and set out, in part, what it considers to be its role in the recruitment of employees. It said:

"The existence of revolutionary organisations whose aim is to damage companies by fermenting unrest is well proven. Revolutionary organisations conceal their identity behind fronts and they use every artifice and method to achieve their aims. Therefore employers have a right, even a duty, to protect the interests of their companies, shareholders and employees alike. They need access to an information service that can help them to identify people who, by their membership or support of revolutionary bodies, can be expected to pose a threat to good relations in the company. The League supplies this information."

There is one problem with that. The information that the league provides—or at least, its interpretation of it —is quite different from reality. Fortunately, some investigative journalism—in particular, the Granada "World in Action" programme—has exposed the sinister activities of the league, as have books such as the "The Economic League—The Silent McCarthyism" by Mark Hollingsworth and Charles Tremayne. They have exposed what the league is up to.

The league includes in its list of revolutionary organisations Christian Aid, Oxfam, War on Want, Greenpeace, the Anti-Apartheid Movement, trade unions and one of the most popular political parties, the Labour party. Those activities, in which ordinary people engage, are revealed to employers to use as an excuse for refusing gainful employment. The paranoia revealed by such an organisation is a threat to open industrial relations, and the Government should support the new clause.

Mr. Graham Riddick (Colne Valley): What evidence is in the book to suggest that employers have refused jobs to people who are members or supporters of the organisations that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned?

Mr. Smith: I do not have time to go through all the examples set out in the book. I shall simply choose a page at random and cite two examples. The first was exposed by "World in Action". Mr. Roy Turnbull, a labourer from

[Mr. Smith]

Newcastle upon Tyne, was for some considerable time refused employment because of his political activities. In fact, Mr. Turnbull belonged to no political party and he said in his testimony that he had never even bothered to vote.

Similarly, Mr. Ken Martin—another labourer from Newcastle upon Tyne—was blacklisted because of information about his political activities that was passed on by the Economic League. That information was false. It accused Mr. Martin of being a long-standing member of the Communist party. As a result, for some considerable time he could not obtain gainful employment. The information was not true because Mr. Martin was not, and never has been, a member of the Communist party. I could cite more examples, but I suggest that the hon. Gentleman reads the book or looks at the "World in Action" video.

The nature of the Economic League is revealed in the way that it gathers its information. It is known to use spies, private detectives, election nomination forms and press cuttings. That is unreliable, clandestine and sinister. The organisation is secretive and sinister in four ways. First, its existence remained a secret for many, many years. Indeed, its existence was denied only recently. Secondly, the organisations and companies affiliated to the Economic League were also secret until recent exposures. I am glad to say that many reputable companies which were previously affiliated have now broken their association because they have recognised the mood of the people of the country—something which the Government, if they do not support the new clause, will fail to do.

Thirdly, the organisation is secret and it keeps its information secret. Indeed, it refuses to put its information on computer but instead keeps manual records that do not come under the Data Protection Act. That is worrying in this day and age and it is another sign of the secret activity of that organisation. Finally, the organisation is secret because the information that it passes to employers about potential employees is secret. In particular, those potential employees do not have access to that information. They do not know what has been said about them. Like the two people whom I cited earlier, they do not have an opportunity to defend themselves. That is disgraceful.

The Government have an opportunity tonight to accept the new clause and the other amendments that we are discussing that relate specifically to trade union activity. Indeed, they have a clear choice—a closed society with closed industrial relations where secretive and sinister organisations can interfere with the smooth running of the labour market in general and recruitment of suitable labour in particular; or an open society where people, especially trade unionists, know exactly what is being said about them behind closed doors. They can then engage in the legitimate trade union activity that we have experienced in Wales.

It was interesting to note that in the rising unemployment figures released today, Wales did not suffer as badly as other regions. We have had some success in inward investment because we have the highest density trade union membership in the country. Those ordinary trade unionists make a major contribution to the economic well-being of the country.

8 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I fully support the new clause. It is unacceptable that those actively involved in trade unions should be discriminated against when it comes to applying for employment. It is even more unacceptable that there should be an organisation such as the Economic League, the main function of which—the reason why it came into existence at the end of the first world war—it to draw up a list of those who, in the view of those who run the organisation, should not be taken on by companies.

The Ecomomic League is funded by a number of large companies. I am pleased to note that more recently, perhaps in the past two or three years and certainly since the television programme, the Economic League has not received the same amount of funding as previously. Nevertheless, it continues to receive quite a large chunk of money.

British United Industrialists, an organisation responsible for receiving funds from companies and passing them on to the Tory party, also acts as a paymaster for the Economic League. It may be of some interest that some 57 companies which subscribe financially to the Tory party also subscribe to the Economic League, so the link is clear.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Did my hon. Friend see the Government Whip laughing then?

Mr. Winnick: Yes. I am not surprised.

The Economic League engages in a number of undeniable habits which should be deplored. For example, officials infiltrate private, political and trade union meetings. They like to get their hands on the attendance lists and use them for their own purposes. My hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) made the point that they also indulge in making a note of those who nominate candidates for local and national elections. All that is for one purpose—to draw up the dossier and to use it for the purposes of discrimination when it comes to employment.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) asked where is the evidence of such discrimination. In the book already referred to, "The Economic League—The Silent McCarthyism", reference is made to Malvyn Barton, a loyal member of his local Conservative club for nearly 10 years. He was a rather reluctant member of a trade union, but for some reason he was branded a militant. His name appeared on the Economic League's list and, as a result, he has been penalised. He has been unemployed for the past six years and is a bitter man. He said:

> "I've always got impeccable references that could get me a job but being on a blacklist is like banging your head against a brick wall. My reputation is now in rags."

The Economic League has not refuted that there is such a dossier on that person.

Derek Ogg is an Edinburgh solicitor whose case should interest Conservative Members. He was chairman of his local Young Conservatives and stood as a Conservative party candidate in the regional and district council elections, but he was listed by the Economic League as an anarchist. The explanation was that he was associated with a magazine which had been on sale in a radical bookshop.

I do not deny that many—perhaps a large majority—or those on the list are active trade unionists and proud to be so—they are not like the two cases to which I have just referred—but in a democratic society, is it wrong for an active trade unionist who takes pride in his trade union membership to want to recruit those who are not in a trade union? Of all the functions of a democratic society—all the things which are not allowed in a dictatorship, fascist or communist—why should that one be the subject of a list kept by a central organisation funded by companies so that the people listed can be penalised, often for years on end?

I wish to refer to two cases nearer home. My right hon. Friend the Member for Stoke-on-Trent, South (Mr. Ashley) is not necessarily considered the most revolutionary member of the Opposition. In the early 1940s, before he went to Ruskin college, my right hon. Friend was a worker and a shop steward in a factory. He was put on the list for no other reason than that he was an active trade unionist and proud of it.

Perhaps even nearer home is my own case. When I finished my Army national service, I went to work in a clerical capacity in engineering. I was an active trade unionist and regularly attended trade union meetings and the annual conference of my union. Two years ago, my union, honoured me with its highest award—it may not seem much to Conservative Members because there is no commercial involvement, but I am proud to be the holder of a gold medal from my union. As an active lay member of my union, I sought then to ensure that, wherever I worked, I would try to recruit non-unionists in engineering establishments into my union, and I make no apology for that. I was put on the London Engineering Employers Federation blacklist for no other reason than my trade union activities.

That was in the mid-1950s, but fortunately in the area where I was living at the time there was no unemployment problem. I could not get work in federated firms, so I went to non-federated firms and had no difficulty in getting employment there. Employers would probably have considered me a conscientious worker. Yet I could not work in any federated firms because I was on the blacklist, merely because I was an active trade unionist. That is a deplorable state of affairs, not because of my experience as such but because of all the other people who are subject to such action.

There seem to be links between the Economic League and the police and special branch. A former official of the Economic League, Richard Brett, who was featured on the television programme as having worked for the Economic League, became somewhat disillusioned. He said that, during his days as an official of the Economic League, he regularly gave talks to the local police on industrial subversion. There is an allegation—the Minister will not be able to respond to this, because it is more a matter for the Home Office—that the Economic League continues to receive information from the police as well as passing information to them. If that is true, it is a further reason why we should deplore the activities of that organisation. I hope that the Home Secretary will look into those allegations and, if they are true, ensure that such actions do not continue.

Fortunately, we live in a political democracy, in a free society, and the freedoms that we have built up are precious, certainly to Opposition Members. Those freedoms, those civil liberties, are seriously eroded when people are penalised simply because of their trade union work, and that is completely unacceptable.

If new clause 2 is not acceptable to the Government —I do not think that it will be—I only hope that, after the next general election, the Labour Government will look at all those aspects and take measures to make such discrimation unlawful. We should have done that before, but I hope that we shall do it next time. If the law is so changed, it will further help to strengthen the freedoms that we already have in Britain. New clause 2 should be enthusiastically supported.

Mr. Riddick: Many hysterical comments have been made, without evidence to back them up. We heard many accusations on Second Reading and I understand that there were one or two lively debates on the subject in Committee.

I have taken the trouble to talk to the Economic League and it has written to me, and I want to inject a touch of realism and accuracy into the debate. I begin by quoting the league's objectives:

"The Economic League collects and analyses extremist papers, magazines, reports and leaflets of left and right alike. Where industries or companies are mentioned by name, we let them know. Where the threat is more general we bring it to wider public attention.

This is just one of the ways in which the League is supporting freedom, free enterprise and democracy against those who are working to destroy it.

We provide an industrial relations advisory service to industry and commerce, particularly aimed at countering politically motivated industrial unrest and the creation of more positive attitudes."

Its aims are clear.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman seeks to defend the league's activities. Does he believe that the information that the league retains on its files should be publicly available, so that people who suspect that information held on them is inaccurate may have the right to appeal?

Mr. Riddick: Yes, people who are the subject of information held by the Economic League should have the right to see it. The Economic League says that people have that very right. Anyone who believes that they appear on an Economic League blacklist can write in, and the league will reply, confirming whether or not it holds any information on them. That is what the Economic League claims. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) claims that he is on an Economic League list, but has he ever written to the organisation to ascertain whether that is the case?

Mr. Winnick: The hon. Gentleman cannot be serious when he makes that suggestion. He must think that people are very naive. I did not suggest that I am on an Economic League list—I may be, or I may not. I explained rather that I had been on a blacklist kept by an employers' organisation.

Mr. Riddick: The hon. Gentleman gave the impression that he is on an Economic League blacklist. I have to say that he was being a little misleading, but I accept now that he was not attempting to suggest that he was on a list kept by the Economic League. The fact remains that one of the league's raisons d'être is to identify industrial saboteurs and make information relating to them available to the companies that subscribe to its services. What is wrong with that?

Mr. Wallace: Last year, the newspaper Scotland on Sunday reported that the league was setting up a list on environmentalists. Do they come within the hon. Gentleman's definition of industrial saboteurs?

Mr. Riddick: It does not sound to me as though environmentalists should be included in that category, but I cannot be sure that there is any truth in the report to which the hon. Gentleman referred. Does he know whether there is any substance to that allegation?

A number of unsubstantiated claims about the league's activities have been made, and I shall refer to them later. Clearly, the Labour party wants to put the Economic League out of business, but the only people to benefit would be left-wing extremists who want to wreak industrial havoc in this country. Perhaps that is what Opposition Members want. If so, their amendments amount to a wreckers' charter.

Several Opposition Members suggested that the league is anti-union and discriminates against trade union members. The league vehemently denies that accusation. I quote from the brochures that the league sends to prospective clients—companies that have expressed an interest in the services that if offers:

"The League is in favour of employees voluntarily joining a trade union, having it represent them and negotiate on their behalf. If the union and the company fail to agree, the League recognises the right of the union to call on its members to take industrial action, provided that they are properly consulted."

8.15 pm

Individuals named in various "World in Action" programmes claimed that they were listed by the Economic League because of their trade union activities, and were as a result refused jobs. I asked the league whether there was any truth in those accusations. Mr. Hardy, the director-general of the league, wrote to me on 9 May:

"The League has no record on the individuals named in the programmes. Furthermore, none of the individuals named has ever either written to us to complain or commenced legal action against us. None of them has ever communicated with us about our alleged blacklisting of them."

I suggest that Opposition Members ask the people named in the "World in Action" reports to contact the Economic League, to establish whether that is true. If those individuals have not done so, or fail to do so, they can hardly go round making wild allegations about being on an Economic League blacklist. The House may be interested to know that the Broadcasting Complaints Commission found that Granada TV's "World in Action" programme

"constituted unjust and unfair treatment of the League."

Do Opposition Members think it would be sensible for a company that employs, for example, a high percentage of Asian workers to employ also an individual having links with the National Front? Of course not. That is the kind of information that the league can provide.

Mr. Winnick: But it does not.

Mr. Riddick: What evidence does the hon. Gentleman have to support that accusation? He has none. He simply makes another wild allegation.

Mr. John P. Smith: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that there is no way of knowing for certain whether the league holds information on a particular individual—because what it does, it does in secret?

Mr. Riddick: I repeat that anyone who believes that they are listed by the league should contact the organisation—[Laughter.] Opposition Members may laugh, but the league has made it clear that it is willing to allow Members of Parliament to visit its offices and inspect its files.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): I can show the hon. Gentleman correspondence that I have received, as someone involved in the Anti-Blacklisting Campaign, from a gentleman who suspected that he was listed by the Economic League. I saw the league's reply, on its letterhead, and it requested him to give a great deal of information about himself—including his name, present addresses, past address, trade union membership, political activities, and so on—and to submit it together with a small fee. In other words, " Please blacklist yourself."

Mr. Riddick: Surely the hon. Lady would want the Economic League to make absolutely certain that the person requesting such information is really the same person appearing in its files—which clearly is of great importance.

Opposition Members claim that the league is trying to avoid the provisions of the Data Protection Act 1984, yet the league itself says that it would have no difficulty in conforming to an extension of that Act to cover manual records. It claims that it would welcome such an extension. I quote again from the letter that I received from the league's director-general:

"Our archives are open for inspection at any time by the Data Protection Registrar and our systems were fully inspected during 1989. The Data Protection Registrar gave us a clean bill of health."

That inspection related to information held on computer. However, the league has made it clear to me that it would be happy for the provisions of the Act to be extended to manual records. Its director-general adds:

"In addition we would be happy to host an all-party deputation of Members of Parliament at our Archive Centre. They will then be able to see the system at work for themselves."

I suggest that Opposition Members take up that offer.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I shall be happy to do so. The league has only to write to me.

Mr. Riddick: Good. I am glad to hear that from the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours).

The actions of the Government will probably diminish the role and the importance of the Economic League because only when the industrial situation is ripe for saboteurs are the services of such organisations necessary. The Government's trade union legislation has made it more difficult for people to subvert trade unions and industries, and I welcome that. It means that the work of the league is less in demand now than it was.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman has made an offer and I and my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) will take him up on it and visit the league. He also mentioned what information it would make available to us. I think that he mentioned that we would be able to see the records, how information is recorded, what is recorded and how manual and computerised record systems work. Judging by what he has been told, can he say that all that will be made available to us as Members of Parliament?

Mr. Riddick: I cannot speak on behalf of the Economic League. I can only quote what is contained in this letter to me. It will be printed in Hansard tomorrow.

The hostility of many Labour Members of Parliament to the organisation, without any proof of wrongdoing, is a poor reflection on them because the league's purpose is to contribute towards upholding industrial peace. I suggest that the Labour party should subscribe to the league—rather than knocking it—and find out about the militants and the people who disrupt its ranks in such places as Liverpool, London and Birkenhead—of course we know the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) has been deselected.

I shall happily vote against the amendments tabled by the Opposition.

Mrs. Fyfese: I am glad to have the opportunity to speak because, some time ago, an anti-blacklisting campaign was formed in the House and it now has a large number of members, including more than 70 Members of Parliament. It is pleasing to note that, in the recent past, the Opposition attacked blacklisting during debates on previous employment legislation and attempted to get the law changed, but they were opposed by the Government. I introduced an anti-blacklisting Bill, which was opposed by the Government. Here we are again tonight, with yet another Employment Bill, taking the opportunity to raise the issue once again and to try to further the democratic standards that we wish to preserve in this country. I am delighted to know that the Labour party has undertaken, in its policy review, to clear up the matter once and for all when Labour forms the next Government.

I am particularly pleased that the Select Committee on Employment will be investigating blacklisting in the near future.

The hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) questioned whether there was any evidence that blacklisting took place. A member of my union, the Transport and General Workers, and an employee of Ford was blacklisted last year. Ford openly admitted—it has been in all the newspapers—that it subscribes to the Economic League and that it practises blacklisting. That admission comes from a major car manufacturing company.

The building workers' union, the Union of Construction, Allied Trades and Technicians, is holding its annual conference soon; because it is so aware of the problems of its members in the construction industry, this will be a major topic for debate. According to the hon. Member for Colne Valley, everyone seems to be letting his imagination run riot.

Mr. Riddick rose——

Mrs. Fyfe: Before I give way, I wish to cite the example of another building firm. Some of its papers came into my hands recently, and the show that the company blacklisted people who had never worked for it, and it did not do so on grounds of incompetence. I shall present that evidence to the Select Committee.

Mr. Riddick: The hon. Lady mentioned Ford. Is it not true that the motor car industry in this country has been blighted during the past few decades by industrial disruption? It has had a history of individuals actively disrupting it—for example, Red Robbo and the mole at Cowley. Such individuals have enormous power. In the past they created tremendous problems for companies, and those problems spilled over to other employees. Surely Ford has a responsibility to its shareholders and its employees to ensure that industrial saboteurs are not employed.

Mrs. Fyfe: I shall come to the general principles of the issue in a moment, but one of the people the hon. Member for Colne Valley named—the so-called Red Robbo——

Mr. Riddick: Answer.

Mrs. Fyfe: I am answering right now, if the hon. Gentleman wants to listen to me. Red Robbo was sacked for no better reason than that he offered an alternative to the plan offered by the management at the time of a dispute several years ago. Notice how far back the hon. Member has to go to find something that he can begin to describe as subversive activity—which it certainly was not.

Thousands of people are on the Economic League's blacklist. The league organises in various parts of the country and has local lists. Presumably it has a nationwide list on its computer. No doubt my hon. Friend and I will ask about that when we visit them.

Do Conservative Members seriously believe that those people are all subversives and revolutionaries? If so, I do not know why the revolution has not already broken out, given the activities of the Government during the past 10 years. Tory Members are talking nonsense. We have been given the evidence of Mr. Richard Brett, who used to be a regional director of the Economic League, and who came to a meeting in the House of Commons organised by the anti-blacklisting campaign. He had fallen out with the league and was prepared to give evidence which will be presented to the Select Committee in due course. He said that, for the vast majority of the huge number of names in the records, the information recorded was inaccurate.

People are listed, they are prevented from getting jobs, but the information on them is not correct. How does that come about? It is due to the league's methods of blacklisting people. It picks up names and addresses from a wide range of left-wing and ultra left-wing newspapers, and other such sources, noting the names of people who are nominated for posts. However, if a senior official of that organisation is prepared to admit publicly that the records are inaccurate, the public have reason to worry.

Sometimes the league has got it right, and has listed someone accurately, but the information is irrelevant. For example, one of my constituents was on the "World in Action" list for no better reason than that she was an organiser for the anti-apartheid campaign. Most people would think that if she put that on a job application an employer might think that it was to her credit—I certainly would. I cannot imagine what employer could object, except perhaps the South African embassy or companies such as Outspan. It is not of interest to industry in general. Those are reasons for putting people on the blacklist.

Even if someone considers himself or herself a revolutionary and a danger to capitalism, Opposition Members realise—although Conservative Members do not—that many such people take themselves more seriously than their activities justify. We have a police force, special branch, MI5 and MI6 and if people are attempting to subvert the interests of the country it is their job to attend to such matters—[Interruption.] As my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) points out, we know that some secret services have taken a strange view of what is and what is not a subversive activity. A former leader of the Conservative party referred to the fact that some of MI6's activities were very strange and that it had odd notions of what constituted subversive activities.

The forces of the state are there to look after the interests of the state. When it comes to employers looking after their own interests, do not Conservative Members of Parliament realise that ordinary, hard-working, decent trade unionists do not want their job prospects to be wrecked and industry to be ruined by people who fancy themselves as some kind of latter-day Lenin? Trade unionists can tackle attempts to make something out of nothing. Ordinary trade unionists are the ones who have suffered the most from such activities. A shop steward who is trying to do a decent job for his members can come to the attention of an organisation such as the Economic League and be blacklisted as a revolutionary or a subversive.

8.30 pm

I have already referred to the fact that people can be invited to blacklist themselves. We have heard that the Economic League is prepared to allow us to examine its records. It believes that it would be a good idea if the law required both computer records and general records to come under the Data Protection Act 1984. Why, therefore, do the Government resist our arguments? I called precisely for such a measure two years ago when I introduced my Bill—that all the records of blacklisting agencies should be open to inspection and that people who had applied for a job and had been checked by a would-be employer should be able to find out what information was held on them. At long last we hear that the Government are prepared to allow that. I can only imagine that it is because they have come under pressure as a result of investigative journalism.

Apart from the Economic League, other organisations have blacklists. They prevent people from gaining employment for reasons wholly unconnected with their ability to do the job. They can be blacklisted for their beliefs, or for their suspected beliefs, or even because of the beliefs of their relatives or friends. They can be blacklisted on the basis of false information. People are tried secretly by unknown individuals who act as prosecutor, judge and jury. They have no opportunity to challenge and correct the false information, unless they choose to write and virtually blacklist themselves. If they had not come to the attention of a blacklisting agency before, they would certainly do so then.

It has been called McCarthyism. I have seen a letter from a man who says that it is worse than McCarthyism, for at least McCarthy was prepared to stand up in front of Congress and the Senate and justify his actions. These people are not prepared to justify their actions. All they do is to talk nonsense about secret revolutions breaking out everywhere in Britain. I hope that the House will throw out this nonsense.

Mr. Leighton: The Bill claims to give people the right to belong to a trade union. It did so belatedly. We heard a great deal about the right not to belong to a trade union. It was only towards the end of the gestation period that we heard anything about the right to belong to a trade union. It is a new right. Under our law, there has never been the right to belong to a trade union.

Since 1926, a printing firm, D. C. Thomson in Dundee, has operated the policy that anybody who wants to be employed by that firm must sign what is called "the document", stating that they are not a member of a trade union. If the right to belong to a trade union is to mean something, we have to ask how that right is to be enforced. If there is no mechanism to enforce the right to belong to a trade union, it will be a completely meaningless sham.

We have heard a great deal about the pre-entry closed shop and how dreadful it is. I do not intend to say a great deal about the Economic League. The Select Committee on Employment has launched an inquiry into recruitment practices. The Economic League is to give evidence to the Committee and I do not wish to prejudge what it will say. A number of other organisations are described as blacklisting organisations. They are engaged in pre-entry discrimination. Discrimination takes place before someone gets a job. It is not a question of an employee not being allowed to join a union; the discrimination takes place before a person even gets the job.

Blacklisting organisations provide the so-called information in secrecy and furtively to firms that then illegally—or what will be illegally—refuse employment. The purpose of a blacklisting organisation is to supply information secretly; then the firm will do something that will be illegal—it will refuse employment and break the law.

What does the Minister intend to do about it? If the Bill gives the right to employees to belong to a trade union but there is pre-entry discrimination, what will the Minister do if firms break the law? That would be wrong, repugnant, mischievous and evil. It must be combated, if we are serious about giving people the right to belong to a trade union.

We must be even-handed. The right to belong to a trade union has to be protected. People must also be given the right to be active in trade unions. It is all very well to give people the right to belong to trade unions, but what happens if they are active trade union members? An active trade union member may find that he is on a blacklist and that therefore he cannot find employment, so it does not seem to me that the right to belong to a trade union has any real meaning. I understand that in Committee my hon. Friends tabled an amendment that would have covered that possibility, but it was rejected by the Government. An explanation is needed.

We know, from all sorts of evidence, that some of these blacklisting organisations are shady and incompetent. We also know that many firms use them. The organisations are secret and furtive, and operate on the fringes of the law. We listened to the apologist or spokesperson for one of these organisations, the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick). Perhaps he will take back the message that, if such organisations were more open, there would not be so much objection to them.

Parliament has considered the matter before. In our modern society, a vast amount of information is available on all of us. According to the Data Protection Act, Parliament has said that we should be able to check what is on the record, but some organisations manage to find furtive ways to circumvent the law. They say that they have manual files. If they were more open about their activities, there might not be the same objection to them. I hope that the Minister will tell us what he thinks about that.

If blacklists deny employment, the so-called right to belong to a union is a sham. In a free society it cannot be right for people to be shut out of employment by the use of secret information. We criticise the secret police and the Securitate in eastern Europe because they kept blacklists and files on people and used informants. I have heard that some of the blacklisting organisations here infiltrate agents into anti-apartheid organisations and trade unions and compile information, rather like the Ceausescu secret police. If those organisations can deny people employment, that must be wrong, and if people being denied a livelihood cannot challenge that secret information, that must be a denial of natural justice.

I want to know what the Government intend to do about it. If they claim that they will give the right to belong to a trade union, perhaps we shall hear that in future it will be unlawful to keep and supply secret, inaccurate and incompetent information to firms which will then operate pre-entry discrimination. Perhaps the Minister will promise to ensure that they are brought under the Data Protection Act and that everything they do will have to be out in the open and that their lists will be published so that not only the employer but the individual—the Conservative party has often said that it has the interest of the individual at heart, and what could be more important to the individual than the denial of his livelihood?—will have access to it. Unless that is done, the so-called right to belong will be a sham. That is the litmus test of whether the Government will be even-handed and give the right to belong as well as the right not to belong. Unless something is done about it, that right will be an empty sham.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I hope that the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) will reflect on his speech. If he looks back through history he will find that one of the great parliamentarians from his constituency was a man called Victor Grayson who is well remembered throughout the valley that the hon. Gentleman now represents in the House of Commons.

Victor Grayson was destroyed by the blacklist. That is how the British establishment dealt with that gentleman all those years ago. If the hon. Gentleman wants to know more about Victor Grayson, he need do no more than read the book about him written by my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). He will learn much about the operation of those organisations that he has sought to defend in the Chamber tonight.

I shall certainly take up the offer that the hon. Gentleman made and go to meet those people, but I say to them in advance that we shall want many questions answered. We will want to know all kinds of information about their organisation which hitherto they have been totally unwilling to provide to journalists that have made contact with them. We shall want them to justify why they question people who apply for information about themselves, and why people are charged the princely sum of £10 to secure access to the personal information kept about them.

We shall also want to know how they can morally justify the compiling of information such as one would expect to find only in parts of eastern Europe and in the Soviet Union. In those countries and in other parts of the world the systems are being dismantled, and it is incongruous that we should allow such operations here in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Riddick: The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) has something of a reputation for instigating bogus smears on hon. Members. I recall the way in which he tried to smear my hon. Friends the Members for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth) and for Hampshire, East (Mr. Mates). I should point out that the portion of the letter that I read out specifically said that the Economic League would be happy for an all-party delegation to visit its premises. That was a sensible caveat to ensure that hon. Members such as the hon. Gentleman do not go on their own and abuse the hospitality of the Economic League. The most effective body of people to carry out such an investigation would be the Select Committee on Employment.

8.45 pm

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I am perfectly prepared to accept the caveat that the hon. Gentleman introduced. If I and my hon. Friends have any difficulty in gaining access, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be willing to accompany us to ensure that the delegation has an all-party complexion.

I should like to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) who, since her election to the House, has done so much in these matters. Her name stands out on the Labour Whip each week, drawing attention to meetings that she is convening. I know that she has played a prominent and important part in uncovering the activities of that organisation and drawing them to the attention of hon. Members and people throughout the country. I should also like to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), who made his maiden spech from the Dispatch Box this evening.

Finally, I turn to a particular issue—who should be blacklisted, if anyone? I want to draw attention to an incident at the Devonshire dockyard in Barrow in Furness in Cumbria. I was approached by a person within the county of Cumbria who drew my attention to the security arrangements in that dock. I should point out that the Devonshire dock is where they are to build the Trident submarine, one of Britain's most secure projects in terms of defence contracts. It demands the highest level of security. It is so secure and officially secret that Parliament cannot be officially informed even of the date of commissioning of the first Trident boat, so we are dealing with a highly sensitive subject.

When I asked the Secretary of State whether the Trident project was being carried out at the Devonshire dock in Barrow I received the reply: "Yes." Then I asked about security. The Minister replied:

> "Security at the Devonshire dock is the responsibility of Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Limited and is being maintained at a level appropriate to the nature of the work undertaken and the perceived threat."

I asked about the screening arrangements for people working in the dock and the security clearance for those already working there and received the reply:

> "It is not the policy of this or previous Administrations to release information on security clearance procedures."—[Official Report, 14 May 1990; Vol. 172, c. 826.]

Clearly they are extremely sensitive matters. One assumes that the level of security at the dock is extremely high.

One of the main contractors in the dock just happens to be a subscriber to the Economic League, a firm called McAlpine, one of Britain's premier construction companies. The firm was recently carrying out work not in the main construction hall but within the dock area in the immediate vicinity of the main construction hall. When McAlpine is short of labour, and needs a specialist skill for a few days, it uses a local labour contractor to employ persons who have to have security clearance to come to the dock and do the work. I understand that on a number of occasions McAlpine has used a firm called Nicholas Labour Hire Ltd. of Preston. The potential employees on the books of that company need security clearance.

I have with me a form which shows that Nicholas Labour Hire Ltd. of Winckley square, Preston, told a person who was to work in the dock area—this relates to a particular occasion but I understand that it has happened on a number of occasions—and who had to clear security, that because of delays with security clearance, he should impersonate an employee of Nicholas Labour Hire Limited, a Mr. Mike Power. Mr. Power is the office manager of Nicholas Labour Hire Limited and I understand that he has security clearance for the dockyard.

Obviously, the contractor, McAlpine, will want to deny knowledge of these matters, as no doubt will Vickers shipyard security officials; they will say that they know nothing about these matters. Nicholas Labour Hire will probably want to blame everyone else, although it is party to this impersonation and deception which is breaching security in a dockyard in the United Kingdom in which the highest level of security manufacturing activity is taking place, aside perhaps from Sellafield and the Aldermaston complex in the south of England.

I want an inquiry to be conducted into this case. How is it that such large companies, one of which at least we know subscribes to the Economic League, can be party to a system by which people are required to impersonate others and breach security to gain access to their place of employment?

I want to know why firms such as McAlpine are willing to subscribe to organisations such as the Economic League as part of the exercise of blacklisting individuals who seek employment, while they themselves are engaged indirectly in breaching security by, if not condoning them certainly not finding out about and preventing, abuses of security on the scale that I have divulged to the House tonight.

I understand that in the dockyard in Barrow there is an inner security area. It was put to me that it would be impossible for people to breach that area, even though they might gain access, by way of security passes, to the main dock area. But I am told by other people in the dock that it possible to move from one security area even into the tighter security area.

Mr. Riddick: This is all irrelevant.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: The hon. Gentleman may say that it is irrelevant. I believe that people in the construction industry—be they McAlpine, Nicholas Labour Hire Ltd. of Preston or Vickers of Barrow—who condone this sort of activity present a far greater threat to national security than ever some trade unionist did who perhaps happened to say the wrong word at the wrong place at a certain time, thereby doing irreparable damage to himself and his prospects of employment for the rest of his life, or perhaps someone who belonged to CND, who attended a rally and whose presence was picked up on a video camera by some crummy official in some organisation that believes it has a right to monitor the activities of people.

We have our priorities wrong. I hope that when the inquiry that I have requested takes place—as it inevitably must take place, since a breach of security has occurred; I have the documentary evidence with me, for I hold in my hand the form that was requested and was filled in requiring a man to impersonate another man—it will prove who really threatens security in this country. I hope that it will address the real issues that confront us.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Patrick Nicholls): Despite some of the remarks that have been made, this is one of those debates in which there is probably more agreement than might at first seem to be the case. At the outset, from the Government Bench, I welcome the hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) to the Opposition Front Bench. He will have found that a great benefit of speaking from that position is that at long last one has something on which to rest one's notes. Speaking for myself, one hardship of being a Back Bencher, having left the court room, is having to leave one's lectern behind. The hon. Gentleman will agree that it is nice to have a lectern again.

The hon. Gentleman came to the heart of the matter —his concern about the Economic League—but the clause and the amendments to it deal with a fundamental point in the Bill, and one which attracts acceptance from hon. Members in all parts of the House. I refer to the proposition that, when it comes to recruitment, the fact of trade union membership should be irrelevant. It must be said that that is not the position under the law as it stands, and that a change is to take place in that respect.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) was concerned that our conversion to the even-handed approach, if I may so put it, came somewhat late in the day, but that is not so. The Green Paper dealt specifically with the pre-entry closed shop, but once the proposals in the Green Paper were being taken forward and worked into a Bill, one saw all the implications and became aware of how to put the policy into practice. The hon. Gentleman will see that an even-handed approach has been adopted on the face of the Bill, as it should be.

Mr. Leighton: I am interested in the pre-entry aspect. If the Minister wishes to be even-handed, does he agree about the other side of the coin? There is pre-entry discrimination by blacklisting organisations if secret, furtive information is given by them to firms which, after the Bill becomes law, illegally discriminate against people who have previously been active in trade unions, and the individual cannot challenge the information. Does the Minister agree that that would be a breach of natural justice? That is pre-entry discrimination for being a trade union member. Does the Minister accept that?

Mr. Nicholls: I will come to that issue in more detail later in my remarks. I accept that we are here in the business of introducing a new criterion that employers will not be entitled to take into account when deciding whether or not to employ somebody. I refer to the fact of trade union membership. Be it the presence or absence of such membership, employers will not be entitled to take that into account. Whatever else we may disagree on, that is accepted by Members on both sides.

The hon. Member for the Vale of Glamorgan said that in Committee we had presented the case on the basis that activities and membership were one and the same thing, but I would not put that construction on it. We made the point that we were dealing essentially with the status of a person, be he a member of a trade union or not, rather than with his activities.

It is equally clear that the mere fact of membership carries with it certain incidental activities which are implicit. That matter was decided by the court as recently as this year, in Discount Tobacco and Confectionery Limited v. Armitage. If one reads that case in conjunction with the older case of Drew v. St. Edmondsbury borough council, it is clear that, although there may be the normal incidence of trade union activity, the organisation of industrial action would not form part of it. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman was fair in keeping his remarks about that as short as he could, but he perhaps condensed matters rather more than I would have done.

The hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan also felt that the Economic League had been defended by Ministers. Let me make it clear that, speaking for myself and for my right hon. and hon. Friends, we never come to the Front Bench to defend the Economic League. It is for the Economic League to defend itself. If it is indulging in any illegal activity, that should be drawn to the attention of the relevant authorities. To say that I or my right hon. or hon. Friends would defend the work of the Economic League would be preposterous. The matter rests on particular knowledge. If any hon. Member has knowledge that the Economic League has acted illegally, that should be drawn to the attention of the police.

Mrs. Fyfe: Our point, which does not seem to be getting through, is that this secret McCarthyism should be made illegal.

9 pm

Mr. Nicholls: I understand the hon. Lady's objections and I promise that I will come to them.

The hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan was fair in the way that he opened up his case. He felt that we were defending the Economic League per se, but we are not. However, I come now to the first point of difference between myself and the Opposition. It is a fair construction to say that they feel that it is undesirable and unfair, and should be made illegal, if an employer decides to use sources of information or tries to find out whether a potential employee has a history of industrial disruption. An employer may want to know whether that person is a well-known subversive.

I assure the hon. Member for Glasgow, Maryhill (Mrs. Fyfe) that I shall come to the point about accuracy of information in a moment. She herself hinted that certain people are on the extreme of right and left—a view which is common ground between us. An employer's wanting to know merely whether a person was involved in industrial disruption should not be made illegal, but——

Mr. Leighton: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan might have liked to hear my "but", but I will give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Leighton: If an employer knew that someone was going to be disruptive and destructive, he could dismiss him. That employee would then go to an industrial tribunal and might prove his case. However, to have secret information to say that somebody was X, Y or Z when he was not and for that person to be unable to challenge that false information is a different matter.

Mr. Nicholls: This will be common ground between us. Yes, if the employer took somebody on and then found one week, two weeks or two years later that the person had a track record for industrial disruption, he could dismiss him. If the person had been employed for the qualifying period, the industrial tribunal could deal with the matter. However, it makes sense from an employer's point of view not to have to dismiss someone in those circumstances. It might make more sense to find out whether the person has a history of industrial disruption—before taking him on.

Mr. Winnick: Does the Minister accept that, for many employers, what he has just described would apply to a person who wanted to be employed by a firm and who was an active trade unionist who wished to recruit others who might not be in a union? In the eyes of many employers, that is a form of industrial subversion. Yet I believe that the practices in which I engaged were perfectly legitimate and right in a democratic society. If people did not want to be persuaded by me to join a trade union, so be it, but why should I or anyone else be prevented from joining a firm because I am an active trade unionist?

Mr. Nicholls: The hon. Gentleman amplifies the point that he made earlier. It may assist the House if I come to that point in due course.

I was making the point that trying to find out not whether someone had been engaged in trade union activities or was a member of a trade union, but whether he had been indulging in something a great deal worse, is obviously a matter in which an employer might take a legitimate interest.

From what I have read in the newspapers about the Economic League, it is clear that some organisations which employ trade unionists have used that organisation. The mere fact that an employer goes to an organisation to find out whether someone has been guilty of industrial disruption should not automatically be made illegal.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) made several allegations of malpractices about which he knew. I hope that he will accept that those allegations are more the province of the Home Office than of the Department of Employment. He came to the crucial point when he said that, under the next Labour Government, he would seek certain changes in the law. I can give the hon. Gentleman some comfort now rather than leaving him to wait until his extreme old age. That change in the law is very much enshrined in clause 1.

Today, if an employer approached the Economic League or any other organisation and found that a person was indulging in trade union activities which were incidental to membership, he would be entitled to take that into account. After enactment of the Bill, however, that will no longer be the case—employers will no longer be able to obtain such information. I do not know whether that assurance is sufficient to make the hon. Gentleman cross the Floor, or vote Conservative, or both, but the change in the law that he expected to come in the days of his grey-haired old age is already being made.

My hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick) also mentioned the Economic League, of which he clearly has some knowledge. He has corresponded with its members, given the House information, and made a certain offer. Again, I do not think that it is for me to pass comment, except to say—this leads me to the main point made by the hon. Member for Maryhill—that any information supplied by such organisations should obviously be accurate. I say that for a number of reasons, one of which may not appeal particularly to Opposition Members. If the organisation providing the information identifies the wrong John Smith, to pick a name at random, thus blackguarding the right John Smith, that will not do the organisation itself any good.

My hon. Friend suggested that people could write asking whether they were on the Economic League's list. If they were sufficiently left or right-wing, they might add, "PS—If not, why not?" The hon. Member for Maryhill and several of her hon. Friends asked, "What about the Data Protection Act?" Although I am sure that the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Colne Valley were as accurate as he could make them, I could not say whether the Economic League favours an extension of the Act to cover manually held records. All that I can tell the hon. Lady is that whether the Act should be extended is a question for the Home Office rather than for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Employment, although I appreciate that the hon. Lady and her hon. Friends welcomed the opportunity to return to the subject, which arose in Committee as well.

Mr. Leighton: The Minister is on to a good point. He will also appreciate the importance of information acquired for recruitment purposes. Does he agree that such information should be covered by the Data Protection Act, and will he take steps to ensure that it is? That might deal with the anxiety felt by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

Mr. Nicholls: I cannot take a view on legislation that has not been introduced by a Department which, were it to do so, would in any case not be the Department in which I serve. The data protection issue is plainly dear to the hearts of Opposition Members, and they will doubtless wish to pursue it, but they cannot pursue it with the Department of Employment.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What is the Minister offering the House? How does he intend to ensure that only accurate information is kept, without requiring the aggrieved individual to pay £10?

Mr. Nicholls: I am responding to the amendments that have been tabled to the clause.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: I have asked a simple question.

Mr. Nicholls: And I will give the hon. Gentleman a simple answer, although he may not find it satisfactory. It is not the business of the clause, or of the Bill, to devise a structure to ensure that the information given out by organisations is accurate. What the clause does—this should be said again, as it represents common ground—is ensure that it will no longer be regarded as legal for a potential employer to refuse a person employment on the ground of trade union membership.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How will he do that?

Mr. Nicholls: I have given the hon. Gentleman my answer to his question. I warned him that he might not find it satisfactory.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-East asked about the sanctions. The details are set out in schedule 1. The tribunal can make an order, or a declaration, about the steps that should be taken to remedy the problem, and compensation can then be awarded.

The hon. Gentleman also said that he wanted the information to be made public. That takes us back to the point about accuracy. I am not sure how far the hon. Gentleman would want to take the matter—he might not wish all the information to be made public on each and every occasion—but I accept the arguments about the accuracy of the information.

Before I outline the concession that I intend to offer, I will deal with the point made by the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours), who asked whether anyone should ever be blacklisted. That is an interesting question, but it seems to me that there is some agreement among hon. Members on both sides that there are some things that employers ought to be able to take into account, and the intention to cause deliberate industrial disruption might be one of them. The Bill deals with trade union membership, which employers will no longer be able to take into account.

Grouped with new clause 2 is amendment No. 21, which would add to a list of criteria set out in the Bill for deciding what would amount to a refusal of employment. It is clearly right that we should be clear about what constitutes refusal of employment. The list is set out in clause 1(5), and the amendment proposes that an extra ground should be offered. The amendment refers to an employer who "offers, and then subsequently withdraws, the offer of employment without giving a satisfactory explanation for the withdrawal of the offer of employment."

The second part of that proposal would not assist Opposition Members in achieving their aim, because the subsection is intended to help us to determine whether there has been a refusal of employment. That matter should not be prejudged—it should be left to a tribunal. I cannot say whether the exact words in the amendment are satisfactory, as I have not yet had time to seek the view of parliamentary counsel, but the Government accept the principle behind it and we are prepared to bring forward a proposal to reflect that in the other place.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Will there be an inquiry into what I have alleged today?

Mr. Nicholls: I was about to come to the points that the hon. Gentleman made. The hon. Gentleman made a number of allegations about firms—McAlpine, Nicholas Labour Hire, Vickers, and others. He made the allegations in his own inimitable way. It is not for me to pass judgment on whether those allegations are right, and the hon. Gentleman needs no lectures from me about how to bring such matters to the attention of the relevant authorities. Clearly, he feels that he has started that process today.

Mr. John Evans: I am grateful to the Minister for accepting the principle of amendment No. 21, which stands in my name. I should explain that I did not participate in the debate merely because of pressure of time and because other hon. Members wished to speak.

Mr. Nicholls: On that thoroughly uncontentious note, I conclude my remarks by congratulating the hon. Gentleman on his perspicacity in realising that an extra paragraph should have been included.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We look with considerable interest to see what the Government propose by way of a concession to my hon. Friend the Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans), and we welcome the fact that they are prepared to make such a concession.

It is disingenuous of the Government to argue that they are doing members of trade unions an amazing favour by making it unlawful to refuse to employ someone because he is a trade union member. The Government do not accept the logic of the case by offering equivalent protection to someone who is active in his or her trade union. It is ludicrous to afford protection to those who are members but not to someone who has taken an active part in his or her union even at a very low level. It will be ridiculous if employers are allowed to use that loophole and continue to refuse to employ on that basis. I must make our strong objections clear. The Government seem to be trying to have it both ways.

I strongly disagree with the hon. Member for Colne Valley (Mr. Riddick), and he would not expect me to say otherwise. My hon. Friends have made good speeches explaining our reasons for that.

It is not good enough for the Minister to tell us piously that he thinks that it is important that such secret organisations provide accurate information. Of course, if they provide information, that information should be accurate, but in reality it is not. It is neither accurate nor acceptable. The very fact that it is gathered in such a covert sinister way means that nobody—neither employer nor employee—should have any confidence in the activities of such listing organisations. They have no place in British industry.

The Government should accept our fairly minimal view of how blacklists should operate in our society. I must make it clear that, in the event of the Government not accepting our proposals, a Labour Government will bring in legislation to that effect. We are committed to that. It is a great shame that the Government do not recognise that they have the same kind of moral obligation if they really have the interests of both sides of industry at heart.

For those reasons, we shall seek to divide the House on new clause 2.

Question put, That the clause be read a Second time:—

New clause 5

CHANGE IN TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT

'Every trade union shall be given sufficient time to ballot its members on whether or not they wish to take industrial action if their employer seeks to change any of the terms and conditions of his employees' contract of employment.'.—[Mr. John Evans.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. John Evans: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take new clause 9—

NOTICE OF CHANGE IN TERMS AND CONDITIONS OF EMPLOYMENT

"Section 15 of the Employment Act 1982 (liability of trade unions in certain actions in tort) will remain in force if an employer changes or attempts to change, without giving at least 14 days notice to the trade union concerned, any of the terms and conditions of his empoloyees' contract of employment.'.

Mr. Evans: Time is pressing, and I shall be brief.

The purpose of the new clauses is to attempt to retain the status quo in what are frequently difficult industrial situations where the work force is at loggerheads with the employer. The specific purpose is to seek to prevent a vicious employer from using clause 6 of the Bill for whatever nefarious ends he may have. Clause 6 would outlaw all unofficial action, not just strikes. If workers take unofficial action—frequently it is taken because an employer procrastinates on some particular problem—their union must "without delay" repudiate the action of its members using the following abrupt and callous words:

"Your union has repudiated any call for industrial action to which this notice relates and will give no support to such action. If you are dismissed while taking unofficial industrial action, you will have no right to complain of unfair dismissal."

If the Government insist on going ahead with this monstrous legislation, they must find a better form of words than that.

The point at issue is that, if the union does not repudiate the action of its members, and if any union official, paid or unpaid, down to the lowliest shop steward, has been in any way involved in the industrial action, the union's funds are placed in jeopardy because the employer or customer of the employer is able to sue the trade union. I will not repeat the instances that I gave in Committee, but the vast majority of actions occur when an employer upsets the status quo.

New clause 5 would give trade unions time to ballot their members when such situations arise. New clause 9 would allow the status quo to remain in place for 14 days. In other words, it would allow the union to go into the place where the dispute was taking place and seek to resolve it without bringing in the whole panoply of the law.

There is any amount of evidence that the overwhelming majority of unofficial actions in Great Britain have been brought about by employers unilaterally altering the status quo at the place of work. The Minister has already accepted the spirit of one of my amendments. I hope that, in the same spirit, he will accept the two new clauses and recognise that they will assist in difficult industrial situations.

9.30 pm

Mr. Nicholls: I can certainly understand why the hon. Gentleman is concerned, but I cannot go as far as accepting the spirit of the amendments. It is clear that the hon. Gentleman does not like the Bill at all. He does not like repudiation structures and looks at a case where he imagines unofficial action breaking out—where an employer unilaterally alters the terms of contract. The hon. Gentleman will know that there are remedies in the civil courts for employers who try to behave in that way. Is there something so special about that type of employer abuse that the repudiation structures in the Bill should be set to one side? I do not see it that way. No extra time needs to be given, because the matter is not time-limited.

As the hon. Gentleman says, the repudiation has to be carried out without delay and even then the union has only to do its best. I understand the hon. Gentleman's motives. He is returning to a matter which he feels strongly about, but I do not agree with him.

Mr. John Evans: The Minister is a lawyer and to say that there is a civil remedy in such cases demonstrates that he does not live in the world of ordinary working people. It is monstrous to make such a suggestion. I hope that my noble Friends in another place will have more time to deal with this matter than I have. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 6

Collective Bargaining Rights

"It is unlawful for any employer to refuse to grant collective bargaining rights to his employees provided that a majority of the employees have, in a secret ballot, voted in favour of collective bargaining rights exercised through the trade union of their choice.".—[Mr John Evans.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. John Evans: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The clause seeks to establish bargaining rights for employees when a secret ballot has been carried out and it has been demonstrated that the employees wish to be represented for collective bargaining purposes by the union of their choice.

Clause 1 of the Bill makes it unlawful to refuse employment to a person because he is or is not a member of a trade union. The Secretary of State claims that he has demonstrated his even-handedness. The Bill is not even-handed; I should be amazed if it were. It is difficult to imagine any situation in which an employer would refuse to employ someone and tell him to his face that he refused to do so because he was a member of a trade union. The chances are that the employer would think up a thousand excuses before he got round to that one.

There is another side to the matter that I should like to draw to the attention of the House. While it would be illegal for an employer to refuse employment on the ground that the person was a member of a trade union, it would not be illegal to refuse employment on the ground of previous industrial activity. The employer would be perfectly free to tell somone to his face that he would not employ him because of the trade union activity in which he had indulged in the past. That needs to be stressed, because perhaps the Secretary of State has overlooked it.

There is another important issue. If the Secretary of State is giving the right to belong to a trade union, surely another right should go with that—the right to representation. The fact that a person is allowed to be a member of a trade union but is then denied the right to have that trade union represent him, which applies in many cases, means that the worker has gained precisely nothing.

An increasing number of companies are unilaterally withdrawing union recognition from their employees. I recently received a letter from SOGAT and the National Union of Journalists protesting about Associated Newspapers withdrawing trade union rights from the members of those two unions and imposing individual contracts on union members. The union makes the point that no other country in the EEC imposes such a policy. It is asking for the right to be recognised.

I hope that the Minister will recognise the strength of what I am saying. Although I do not expect him to accept my new clause, as a member of the Labour party who has always taken a great interest in trade union affairs, I assure him that, now that the Tory party has given the right to individuals to belong to a trade union, the next Labour Government will give the recognition rights that must go with that.

Mr. Nicholls: If a Labour Government, some time in the future, were to do that, they would be turning back the clock a very long way. The hon. Gentleman is aware that one of the first legislative steps that the Government took in industrial relations was to repeal sections 11 to 16 of the 1975 Act, which provided for what one might call compulsory recognition procedures. It is one of those issues on which one must decide where one stands. The Government do not doubt that it is for the employer to decide whether to recognise a trade union for a particular purpose. It would not be a progressive step to turn back the clock.

The hon. Gentleman should cast back his mind to the unique position of the 1970s, when ACAS told the Government that the recognition procedures were not constructive. To return to the atmosphere of the 1970s, with all the recognition disputes of that time, would be wrong. It was not appropriate for the 1970s, it was not appropriate for the 1980s and it certainly is not right for the 1990s.

Mr. John Evans: The Minister has missed my point. I referred to a majority of employees holding a secret ballot and voting for collective bargaining rights. It is clear that the Government's thoughts lie entirely with the employers. The Opposition believe that collective bargaining is a joint exercise between employers and trade unions. We shall seek to redress the balance that has been heavily tilted in favour of employers and against employees. I shall be seeking a more equitable state of affairs—in about, I suggest, 18 months.

Again, I have not had the opportunity to develop my argument because of the pressure of time. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

New Clause 13

Limited Extension of Legal Aid to Industrial Tribunal Proceedings

'In schedule 2, Part I to the Legal Aid Act 1988, after paragraph 3 there shall be inserted:

"3A. Proceedings in industrial tribunals relating to the question of whether or not the tribunals jurisdiction is excluded by section 62 or 62A of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978, or which are proceedings under schedule 1 of the Employment Act 1990."'.—[Mr. Wallace.]

Brought up, and read the First time.

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move, That the clause be read a Second time.

The principle of the new clause is to extend legal aid to industrial tribunal proceedings as specified in the new clause. We believe that legal aid could be more generally applied to proceedings before industrial tribunals. After all, the issues raised are often fundamental to an individual's rights, and not least his employment. Important issues can arise and, as in the civil courts, individuals should have the right to legal aid if they meet the financial criteria. Employment rights should be of equal importance.

To get the new clause within the scope of the long title, we have had to restrict it to two particular matters. They are relevant matters in respect of which we believe that individuals should rightly receive legal aid assistance to enable them to pursue their cases. The first relates to circumstances where, under clause 7, an employee would lose the right to go to an industrial tribunal if he was dismissed while engaged in an unofficial industrial action.

During earlier debates there was considerable discussion about the circumstances in which action might or might not be considered to be industrial action. The Minister agreed that that was a matter which the industrial tribunal could determine. Having a mind as to what would come up later, I noted that he said that such matters could be complicated and technical. The fact that they might be so complicated and technical means that the individual who wishes to take such a matter to an industrial tribunal should have recourse to legal aid so that he is properly represented before the tribunal.

The new clause also applies to tribunal hearings under such schedule, which relates to the protection given to individuals—their right to belong or not to belong to a trade union. Hon. Members have asked whether that includes trade union activities. That may give rise to important litigation and the new clause would bolster up the right, which I welcome, to belong or not to belong to a trade union.

Starred new clause 14 would make the same provisions for Scotland and if, in his wisdom, the Minister is prepared to allow my new clause, he will ensure that in another place equivalent Scottish provisions will also be legislated.

Mr. Nicholls: The new clause caused me something of a dilemma because I could not decide whether to take the statesmanlike approach, realise that the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) had to frame it in the way that he had and deal with what he would have liked it to deal with, or to take my usual approach and castigate him for deficiencies in the drafting. I decided to be magnanimous. I understand that the only way in which the hon. Gentleman could bring the new clause within the scope of the Bill was to tie it to the jurisdictional points.

It might be possible, even if ingenuity was not necessary, to consider the jurisdictional points as crucial to whether a person could get himself before a tribunal, but at the end of the day it would produce some curious anomalies. For example, if in the middle of a hearing a jurisdictional point was satisfied, the person would find that he did not have legal aid. This is all about, in intent if not in form, whether legal aid would be available for industrial tribunal hearings.

The hon. Gentleman and I share a common guilt in that we are both lawyers and that may frame our attitudes in a particular way. But putting aside the commercial possibilities, industrial tribunals are supposed to be a relatively informal mechanism, and the provision of legal aid will only encourage their formalism by bringing people like us into them more readily. Therefore, I cannot accept the spirit or the form of the new clause, but I compliment the hon. Gentleman on his ingenuity.

Mr. Wallace: The Minister's response comes as no surprise, and I thank him for his compliment. When the important issue of employment arises, it would not be unreasonable to have legal representation. I understand that moves are afoot to bring litigation on contracts of employment into the scope of industrial tribunals which at present qualify for legal aid in the civil courts. If that change comes about, we shall have to look afresh at having legal aid for tribunals. However, clearly, I shall not make much progress on the words on the amendment paper. Therefore, I beg to ask leave to withdraw the new clause.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3

INTERPRETATION AND OTHER SUPPLEMENTARY PROVISIONS

Amendment made: No. 1, in page 3, line 36, at end insert—

'(1A) Where a person may not be considered for appointment or election to an office in a trade union unless he is a member of the union, or of a particular branch or section of the union or of one of a number of particular branches or sections of the union, nothing in section 1 applies to anything done for the purpose of securing compliance with that condition although as holder of the office he would be employed by the union.

For this purpose an "office" means any position—

(a) by virtue of which the holder is an "official" within the meaning of section 30(1) of the Trade Union and Labour Relations Act 1974, or

(b) in relation to which the duty in section 1 of the Trade Union Act 1984 (duty to hold elections) applies.'.—[Mr. Eggar.]

Clause 5

MINOR AMENDMENTS RELATING TO BALLOTS

Amendments made: No. 3, in page 5, line 10, leave out 'section 10' and insert 'Part II'.

No. 4, in page 5, line 13, at end insert

'; and related expressions shall be construed accordingly.'.

No. 5, in page 5, line 25, leave out

'137 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978' and insert

'127 of the Employment Protection Act 1975'.—[Mr. Nicholls.]

Mr. Howard: I beg to move amendment No. 6, in page 5, line 30, at end insert—

'(4) In section 4(1B) of the Trade Union Act 1913 and section 2(5) of the Trade Union Act 1984 (requirements with respect to voting papers in political fund ballot or ballot for union office), in paragraph (a) after "must", insert "state the name of the independent scrutineer and".

(5) In section 15(2) of the Employment Act 1988 (duties of trade union with respect to independent scrutineer in case of political fund ballot or ballot for union office), after paragraph (b) insert—

"(bb) must, before the scrutineer begins to carry out his functions, either—

(i) send a notice stating the name of the scrutineer to every member of the union to whom it is reasonably practicable to send such a notice, or

(ii) take all such other steps for notifying members of the name of the scrutineer as it is the practice of the union to take when matters of general interest to all its members need to be brought to their attention;".'.

Mr. Speaker: With this, it will be convenient to take amendment (a), leave out lines paragraph (bb) and insert—

'(bb) must supply any member of the union, upon demand, with the name of the scrutineer and the address at which he may be contacted.'.

Mr. Howard: Amendment No. 6 springs directly from the recent ballot rigging in the election for the executive of the Transport and General Workers Union.

The House will recall that, on 9 February this year, the general secretary of the Transport and General Workers Union announced that, because of irregularities in the voting for the executive, he had suspended the ballot and was ordering the election to be held all over again. It subsequently emerged that up to 10,000 voting forms had been forged, affecting the elections for 11 of the 39 seats on the union's executive.

The law requires that an independent scrutineer be appointed to oversee union executive elections, but the ballot rigging was apparently discovered by the Electoral Reform Society, which had been engaged to count the votes and not to act as independent scrutineer for the ballot. The scrutineer appointed by the union was someone entirely different.

9.45 pm

No doubt Mr. Todd, the union's general secretary, had reasons for this arrangement. It was, of course, entirely proper for him to appoint one organisation to count the votes and someone else to act as scrutineer. What was curious and, for reasons I will explain, disturbing was that very few people appeared to know about that arrangement. According to newspaper reports, not even the candidates in the election knew the scrutineer's identity.

There was a natural assumption that the Electoral Reform Society was acting as scrutineer. The society is, after all, one of only three organisations specified by name in a statutory instrument as eligible to undertake independent scrutiny of such ballots. The society has a long and honourable record and has been used in that way by a number of other trade unions.

Furthermore, I understand that the members of the union were asked to return their completed voting forms to "The Scrutineer, c/o the Electoral Reform Society".

In all the circumstances, therefore, it was natural for members of the union to assume that the society was indeed the appointed scrutineer for the election.

Clearly, that was a profoundly unsatisfactory situation. Parliament has laid down that unions must appoint independent scrutineers to oversee union elections. The Employment Act 1988 makes it clear that an independent scrutineer must be someone whom the union has no reason to believe will carry out his functions incompetently, or who could reasonably have his independence in relation to the union or the election called into question. In addition, the qualifications that must be satisfied to be eligible as an independent scrutineer of trade union elections are set out in some detail in an order made by my predecessor.

If the scrutineer appointed by a trade union does not meet those qualifications, the law allows the members of that union to challenge the validity of that election. But, of course, those rights are worthless if the union members do not know who the scrutineer is. Nor is it likely to occur to any of them to challenge the appointment if, as in this case, there is a widespread impression that the scrutineer is an organisation as widely respected as the Electoral Reform Society.

As the House will recall, when the identity of the scrutineer became known, there were reports of considerable concern within the union. Allegations were made—and strongly denied—about the role that the scrutineer himself had played in the first, invalid, election. Any such allegations are properly a matter for the police investigation that is now taking place.

Under the 1988 Act, the scrutineer has a clear and specific duty to supervise the production and distribution of all the voting papers. What is abundantly clear in this case is that, whatever arrangements were made for producing and distributing the voting papers, they were not proof against activities so serious that Mr. Todd felt obliged to order the elections for all 39 seats—not just the 11 directly affected—to be held all over again. As a result of the controversy within the union over his role in the first election, the scrutineer resigned before the second ballot took place.

Those are the facts as they have emerged since Mr. Todd's announcement on 9 February. It is a great pity that those responsible have not been identified. Calling in the police was delayed for a total of six weeks while an internal investigation was carried out under the personal supervision of the union's general secretary. It has been widely reported that the internal investigation was unable to establish who was responsible. If that is the case, the delay in calling in the police is all the more unfortunate.

What concerns us here is not so much the irregularity involved in the ballot—serious as that clearly was—as the fact that the members of the TGWU were kept in ignorance of the identity of the scrutineer appointed by their union to oversee the election, and were thus denied the right to challenge his appointment—had they wished to do so—until after the ballot rigging had been discovered.

In Committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Elmet (Mr. Batiste)—who cannot be present this evening as a result of a long-standing engagement—moved an amendment designed to meet that problem. His amendment was technically defective, but amendment No. 6 deals directly with the problem. It adds a new requirement to the duties of trade unions with respect to the independent scrutiny of ballots and elections that are set out in section 15(2) of the Employment Act 1988.

Amendment No. 6 requires a union to notify its members of the identity of the scrutineer before he begins to carry out his functions. That can be done in whatever way the union normally communicates matters of general interest to its members, but the amendment also requires the union to include the name on each voting paper, so that every member of the union knows, before he casts his vote, who is the scrutineer. That is an entirely reasonable addition to the rights of union members. There can be no justification for a union to withhold the name of the scrutineer, especially in circumstances where union members may be misled into thinking that an entirely different organisation, such as the Electoral Reform Society, has been appointed to do the job.

Mr. Wallace: Have the Minister and his Department any estimate of the likely cost to unions, for example to the Transport and General Workers Union, if they were to implement the new statutory requirements?

Mr. Howard: Since all they would have to do is to specify the name of the scrutineer on the ballot paper, I cannot believe that there would be any significant cost.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): We all want fairness in ballots; that is clear. Does the Minister want the same for companies' shareholders? Does he want their ballots to be accurate and checked on carefully?

Mr. Howard: I have never before heard it alleged that shareholders are deprived of any information about any matter on which they have the right to cast their vote. If they have that right, they are given all the information that they require.

This is not a minor matter. If union members do not know who the scrutineer is, they are effectively denied the rights that they were given by the Employment Act 1988 to challenge the scrutineer's competence and qualifications to do the job. As a result, the validity of a whole election may be cast in doubt. Therefore, I hope that—contrary to some of the indications that we have been given tonight—we can look to the whole House to support the amendment.

Mr. Wallace: We have heard an interesting speech from the Secretary of State. How many times have hon. Members and the Chair heard Ministers refuse to commit themselves or take any action on an issue, pending the outcome of an inquiry? Today, however, the Secretary of State is jumping the gun. The amendment does not seem to add much to what is already in the Bill, but the Minister seems to want to make some cheap points at the expense of the Transport and General Workers Union. So far as I can tell, the general secretary of that union took a responsible course of action and called the police in to investigate. The Minister could have had the decency to wait for the investigation to take place before coming up with proposals which do not add up to very much.

If I have misunderstood the position, I would not insist on pressing the amendment in my name, but as I understand it, the Government's amendment uses the words:

"must, before the scrutineer begins to carry out his functions".

That might mean that things have to be done in advance of the ballot. Notice will have to be given of the identity and address of the scrutineer. It was for that reason, to avoid possible expense and unnecessary time-wasting, that I suggest that any union member who wished to find out the name and address of the scrutineer or where he or she or the body concerned could be contacted could simply ask and the union would be obliged to tell them. That seems to me a simple way to achieve much the same end.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. Member moved his amendment?

Mr. Wallace: I have not.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: As the Secretary of State is one of the better-paid Members of the House, I should have thought he had better things to do with his time than waste it on such a ridiculous amendment. But for the fact that the Secretary of State has clearly decided to put trade unions back on the political agenda to appease the Prime Minister or the lunatic right of his party, he would recognise that the amendment is totally irrelevant.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) made the valid point that a police investigation is under way. In other circumstances, Ministers would come to the Dispatch Box to say that it would be premature to take any action before the investigation is concluded. At best, the amendment is premature—at worst, it is totally irrelevant to trade union members and to the Government.

Mr. John Evans: Tory Members talk a great deal of humbug about the election of trade union officials. When the Tory leadership election took place, my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) went into the Committee Room where the Tories were conducting their ballot and discovered that there was no protective cover for Tory Members voting in that election—they had to mark their ballot papers in front of the scrutineer. Yet they criticise trade union ballots.

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend makes a powerful point. As the Secretary of State is paying attention to the fine details, I have no doubt that he will wish to respond to it.

If the Secretary of State has nothing better to do than spend his time on this kind of amendment, he ought to look for something else to do.

Mr. Howard: In the election for the leader of the Conservative party, there was no doubt about who the scrutineers were. The purpose of the amendment is to make clear to trade union members who the scrutineer is when they exercise their vote. The Opposition's reaction is truly astonishing. This modest measure simply ensures that trade union members have the information that they require so that they can complain if anything goes wrong. It does not prejudice the inquiry. These general procedures will lead to an improvement in the rights of trade union members. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) has proved once again that his party is the party of trade union officials, not trade union members.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 6

RESPONSIBILITY OF TRADE UNION FOR ACTS OF OFFICIALS, &C.

Amendments made: No. 7, in page 6, line 7, leave out 'is' and insert

'was at the material time'.

No. 8, in page 6, line 7, leave out 'include' and insert 'included'.—[Mr. Howard.]

Mr. Wallace: I beg to move amendment No. 27, in page 6, leave out lines 22 to 27 and insert—

'(b) the union must do its best to give written notice of the fact and date of repudiation, without delay, to the employer of workers taking part, or likely to take part, in industrial action as a result of the act.

(c) on being notified of repudiation by the union, the employer must, without delay, inform his employees who are members of the union of the fact and date of the union's repudiation.'.

Mr. Speaker: With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 28, in page 6, line 29, leave out '(b)(i)' and insert '(c)'.

Mr. Wallace: This deals with the procedure that a union must follow in order to repudiate any suggestion of industrial action. When these provisions were debated in Committee, the Under-Secretary of State said that their purpose was to be fair to unions. Many Committee members pointed out that onerous duties would be placed on unions under subsection (5)—not least to inform every union member who might take part in industrial action.

The amendment seeks to oblige a union to give written notice of repudiation and the date of that repudiation without any delay to the employers of the workers taking part in industrial action. It would then be the duty of the employer without delay to inform his employees who are union members. The employer undoubtedly has more direct access and quicker means of communication with his employees than the union. It would undoubtedly be in the employer's interest to impart that information. If he could do so more efficiently and quickly than the union, it would relieve the union of an additional burden and responsibility. It might also be in the interest and to the benefit of the employer. In the interests, therefore, of achieving a fair balance, I hope that the Minister will accept the amendment.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: We welcome the amendment. We are unhappy about the clause, but the Minister knows the arguments. The amendment is designed not to undermine the clause but to provide limited help to trade unions. I hope that the Minister accepts that it is in the interest of maintaining a proper balance, even though the clause is very unbalanced, that the amendment has been tabled.

Mr. Nicholls: On other occasions and at another time of day I should have had rather a lot to say about the amendment. I cannot accept it. The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) is concerned that the obligations placed on unions are unduly onerous. We certainly do not accept that. The obligation is to take steps to repudiate what is effectively official action. If the union does not want to stand by that action and wants to repudiate it, it seems entirely right that it should draw that to the attention of those to whom the call has been made. The obligation is not absolute, even on the face of the Bill; it is merely that the union has to do its best and to proceed without delay, so that is not particularly onerous.

The hon. Gentleman says, in a moment of brevity—I wondered whether it was in a moment of levity—that the obligation should be given to the employers; let them deal with it, as it is their problem. It would also have the ingenious, and I assume unintended, effect——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Employment Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

As amended (in the Standing Committee), again considered.

Question again proposed, That the amendment be made.

Mr. Nicholls: All the employer would have to do would be to ensure that he did not give the employees notice. That would mean that the repudiation had not been effective and that the union would remain liable. Some might think that that would appeal to the Government, but they would be entirely wrong. I cannot accept the amendment.

Mr. Wallace: On the first day of the Committee, the Minister was generous enough to say that he would try not to make cheap debating points on the basis of inadequate drafting. He could not help himself in the last gasp, but I forgive him. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 10

CONSEQUENTIAL REVISION OR REVOCATION OF CODES OF PRACTICE

Amendments made: No. 9, in page 9, line 38, leave out subsections (1) and (2) and insert—

'(1) A Code of Practice to which this section applies may be revised by the appropriate authority in accordance with this section for the purpose of bringing it into conformity with subsequent statutory provisions by the making of consequential amendments and the omission of obsolete passages.

"Statutory provisions" here means provisions made by or under an Act of Parliament, and "subsequent" statutory provisions means provisions coming into force after the Code was issued (whether before or after the commencement of this section).'

(2) The Codes of Practice to which this section applies are—

(a) those issued under section 3 of the Employment Act 1980, in relation to which the appropriate authority is the Secretary of State,

(b) those issued under section 6 of the Employment Protection Act 1975, in relation to which the appropriate authority is the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service, and Order for Third Reading read.

10.1 pm

Mr. Howard: I beg to move, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

The Bill is a further step in the step-by-step reform of industrial relations that was begun more than 10 years ago. It carries that process of reform an important stage further by removing the last vestige of legal protection from the closed shop and imposing necessary restraints on secondary action and wildcat strikes. It also gives trade union members rights not to be refused employment on account of their membership.

Mr. Robert Hayward (Kingswood): May I put on record the fact that I regret the continued omission of a dispensation for employers who hold strong religious beliefs and who do not have equal freedom not to recognise trade unions in the same way that employees have that right.

Mr. Howard: My hon. Friend knows that we have given careful consideration to that, as I undertook on Second Reading that we would, but we are unable to meet the point that he has raised.

The Labour party believes that the role of the law in these matters is to protect the striker and the union leader. We believe that the law must protect jobs and businesses from the abuse of industrial power and that it must guarantee the democratic rights of trade union members. That is what the Bill will achieve, and that is why I commend it to the House.

10.3 pm

Mr. Blair: We have debated the Bill for many weeks in Committee and again in the House today. I suggest that two issues have emerged clearly. First, the Bill is unfair because it fails to provide protection against discrimination on the ground of people's trade union activities and against the blacklisting of people who are active in trade unions—something which should unite all democratic members of society. It bans any form of sympathy action, no matter what the circumstances or justification.

The Bill is unfair, above all, because it removes from people the right to go to an industrial tribunal and it shuts out the jurisdiction of the tribunal when people take unofficial action, irrespective of the reasons for their action and even when they are about issues such as health and safety—matters which should concern us all.

The Bill is unfair and it is also irrelevant. As we examine the issues that face Britain today—the training and skills crisis, the problems of low pay and problems concerned with women at work—and measure the Bill against those problems, it is clear that it fails not merely because it is unfair but because it is utterly irrelevant to the nation's future. A Labour Government will in due course address that future.

10.5 pm

Mr. Wallace: The one good step that the Bill takes is to abolish the pre-entry closed shop. We on this Bench not only welcome that, but we called on the Government to take that step even before they were prepared to do so. That aside, the Bill and particularly clause 7 is so wholly alien to the promotion of good industrial relations that as a package it cannot possibly be supported.

The Government are aware that we on this Bench have been prepared to support some of the employment legislation that they have introduced. For example, we strongly supported ballots. But we believe that the purpose of the law in industrial relations—where it should appear at all—should be in the pursuit of balance and fairness. This Bill, like the measure on this subject introduced in the previous Session, is an effort to tilt the balance in favour of employers by introducing small measures here and there—and, in clause 7, a large measure—which disrupt that balance.

To bring in the law in that way is no substitute for a proper and good industrial partnership in industrial relations. The measure will not achieve the good industrial relations that hon. Members in all parts of the House wish to see.

10.7 pm

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I listened carefully to the remarks of Labour Members. I had not intended to intervene at this stage because my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward), in an intervention to the Secretary of State, covered the point that I wanted to make.

I welcome the Bill because of the contribution that it will make to providing a more satisfactory mechanism by which powerful bodies representing workers and employers may settle disputes and because it seeks in a genuine way to provide for the consciences of individual workers to be met.

When my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood raised with the Minister the question of people's religious conscience, there was a cry from the hon. Member for St. Helens, North (Mr. Evans), from a sedentary position, to the effect that we should not take notice of the Plymouth Brethren because they did not vote. That was a disgraceful statement to make——

Mr. John Evans: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for the hon. Gentleman to put words in my mouth? I did not make the statement that he claimed I made. I said that the hon. Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward) would not get the Plymouth Brethren vote because they did not vote.

Mr. Speaker: I do not intend to get involved in that matter.

Mr. Griffiths: I accept the hon. Gentleman's interpretation of his own words. The suggestion that we should ignore the legitimate, deeply held views of a body of people who may not vote is unacceptable to me. It is important for us to put on record the fact that at least some hon. Members take the view that we are here to represent all the people, regardless of whether they voted in the last election or will vote in the next. The genuinely held conscience of individuals is a matter of great concern to the House, even at a little after 10 o'clock.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

Godfrey Ermen Playing Field, Manchester

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn—[Mr. Wood.]

10.20 pm

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, Gorton): In the presence of my hon. Friend the Member for Stretford (Mr. Lloyd) let me say that I know that the first thing that the House will want to do is to congratulate Manchester United football club on its magnificent victory in the cup final.

I am grateful to you, Mr. Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to raise on the Adjournment an issue of great importance to my constituents. I am well aware that the Adjournment debate is a Back-Bench prerogative which ought rarely, if ever, to be invaded from the Front Bench. I hope that by the time I have finished speaking hon. Members will understand why I have felt it necessary to initiate this debate.

In 1989, a wealthy Manchester cotton manufacturer of Dutch origin, Godrey Ermen, left a fund of £200,000 in trust for any object deemed worthy of assistance. In 1928, Arthur Roby QC, Godfrey Ermen's great-nephew and a trustee of the fund, gave a grant of £5,000 to Manchester and Salford Playing Fields Society for the purchase of land in Abbey Hey, Gorton, and for the land be laid out as a playing field. The £5,000 being found insufficient, a further £670 was added. When the land was purchased, it was ordered by the board of Charity Commissioners for England and Wales that it "shall forthwith vest in the official trustee of charity lands."

Later,

"These thirteen acres and sixteen perches or thereabouts" became known as the Godfrey Ermen fields.

The inauguration ceremony in 1931 was presided over by the lord mayor of Manchester. At that ceremony, the field was dedicated "for ever and ever" for the use of all who choose to use it as a playing field. The lord mayor declared that the field was a "very fine lung" for Gorton and Openshaw. The field has not been used for sporting purposes since 1985. Even so, it has remained a valuable amenity to local residents—a green oasis in a heavily built-up area.

My constituency is one of the most heavily populated in the United Kingdom. In the list of the most densely populated parliamentary constituencies, it comes 47th out of 650. It is included in a Manchester and Salford inner-city partnership area in recognition of the deprivation that exists. It is in an area with one of the poorest health records in the city which, according to the city council, gives cause for concern. In the 1980s, people living in east Manchester, in which Gorton is situated, had a 73 to 78 per cent. greater likelihood of dying prematurely than people in the country as a whole. East Manchester has had more fatal and serious accidents involving children than anywhere else in Manchester, and it enjoys less recreational provision than the rest of the city. My constituents need the "very fine lung" provided by the green and open space of Godfrey Ermen field as much as they ever did.

A planning application for the use of the land for a residential development was refused in 1975, on the grounds, among others, that it conflicted with the provision of the city development plan which allocates the land for sports grounds and allotments and woud also result in the loss of playing fields, which are underprovided in east Manchester and the city as a whole.

The city planning department stated to me this week that a general presumption against developing existing playing fields such as this is built into the city's development plan and into the structure plan. The House can therefore imagine the alarm when reports recently began to circulate that the Godfrey Ermen field was to be sold—or even had been sold—for building purposes. Although it was established that the field had not been sold, within a short period 2,000 local residents had signed a petition requesting that the Godfrey Ermen field be saved. Many more would have signed if more time had been available before, with councillor Colin Brierley and a representative of the residents, I presented the petition to the lord mayor of Manchester on 13 October.

The leader of the city council wrote to me stating:

"The Playing Fields Association do admit that the land is surplus to their requirements and that they have had discussions with developers, including Barratts."

The city planning department wrote to councillor Anne Unwin last October stating:

"The land . . . is being marketed through the firm of estate agents, Dunlop Heywood."

Following the presentation of the petition, on 18 October 1989 I wrote to Mr. David Gallop, the secretary of Manchester and Salford Playing Fields Society, requesting a meeting to discuss the future of the playing fields. The meeting was to be attended by local residents, the ward councillors—Tom Hamnett, Colin Brierley and Anne Unwin—and myself. Mr. Gallop's reply ignored my request for a meeting, so I wrote again, again asking for a meeting. Mr. Gallop wrote back stating:

"the reason for not addressing the question of a meeting at this stage was to enable you"— that is, myself or the residents—

"to put forward any suggestions you might think helpful, and which would serve as a basis for discussions at any such meeting."

What we wanted was a meeting to clarify the intentions of the playing fields society. Even so, I wrote again to Mr. Gallop saying that any suggestions could be put forward at the meeting and, once again, asking for a meeting. Mr. Gallop wrote back, stating:

"My offer of a meeting still stands"—

although he had not offered one—

"providing you first put forward suggestions in writing . . . failure to take advantage of this offer can only cast doubt on the motives for your suggested meeting."

On receipt of that completely unprovoked, nasty and offensive letter, I decided that nothing more could be gained from communicating with an individual who was clearly both arrogant and unpleasant—and just as clearly unfitted to hold the secretaryship of a charitable organisation.

I therefore tabled a motion on the Order Paper expressing concern and followed it up with a letter to the chairman of the playing fields society, Mr. Leslie Mellor, asking amicably and politely for the meeting previously requested. That was on 28 December. By 2 March, he had not replied, so on that date I wrote again, again in amicable terms, but also advising Mr. Mellor that a failure on his part to respond would leave me with only the recourse of using my parliamentary opportunities to air this matter. He still did not reply, so I have sought and obtained this debate.

[Mr. Gerald Kaufman]

Mr. Gallop wrote to a local resident on 9 March stating:

"As far as the right hon. Gerald Kaufman M.P. is concerned, every letter from him has been personally answered within 48 hours."

Mr. Gallop is a liar. None of my letters has been answered within 48 hours and the letters that I have sent since 28 December—nearly five months ago—have not been answered at all.

Mr. Gallop told me the Manchester Evening News yesterday:

"We have had no chance to reply".

Once again, he is a liar. He and Mr. Mellor have had seven months to reply, either at a meeting, which I have repeatedly requested, or in replies to my letters which Mr. Leslie Mellor has refused to provide. In any case, Mr. Gallop wrote to the Lord Mayor of Manchester on 18 April declaring:

"There is really no point in holding any meetings."

During the past few months, there has been a succession of odd events and disturbing discoveries. Mr. Gallop said on the telephone to one of my constituents, Mr. Trevor Mooney, who lives in Ackroyd avenue next to the Godfrey Ermen field, that the Manchester and Salford playing fields society was thinking of building on the field. He suggested to Mr. Mooney that he should sell his house to make way for an access road to the field. Why did he do that if there are no plans to build on the field?

Mr. Gallop wrote a letter to the lord mayor of Manchester containing a further lie—that he had given me assurances when he had given me none. In that letter he admitted:

"We have been approached at regular intervals by various property developers to sell the ground for housing etc but this is not uncommon with owners of land like ourselves. Discussions have taken place with some of these developers regarding their proposals, but nothing that might be acceptable has arisen from these discussions."

What on earth is a charitable trust doing having discussions with property developers about proposals from them about land bought by funds from a trust which was vested in the official trustee of charity lands and dedicated for use as a playing field "for ever and ever"?

Last month Mr. Richard Chambers, a representative of the surveyors Dunlop and Heywood, who act for the playing fields society, turned up at the Godfrey Ermen field. He handed his card to one of my constituents who lives in a neighbouring house in Violet street. He appeared to break the lock on the gate giving access to the field, to replace it with a new lock and to measure the width of the field.

My office has been in touch with Mr. Chambers this week and he states that he did no more than come and replace a broken lock. I do not question his word, but he will understand why in the present circumstances his action was interpreted with suspicion by local residents, especially as one of my constituents was told by Dunlop Heywood that plans had been drawn up for building on the playing field and three tenders had been received. My constituent was even told that three houses in Ackroyd avenue would have to be demolished to provide access.

I know nothing about Mr. David Gallop, the secretary of the playing fields society, other than that he is an untruthful and offensive person. However, unless there is more than one Leslie Mellor, I understand that Mr. Leslie Mellor, the chairman of the playing fields society, is an estate agent by profession, that he recently sold the estate agency which carried his name to another member of his family, Edward, and that Edward Mellor also owns a building company called East Manchester plc of which Leslie Mellor is said to be a director. If that is so, is Mr. Mellor a suitable person to be the chairman of a charitable organisation that owns land which, if made available for development, could be worth millions of pounds and on which 150 houses could be built?

Is an estate agent a suitable person to be the chairman of an organisation which admits to holding discussions about developing land which is clearly prey for property speculation? Who put Mr. Mellor in his position, and who put Mr. Gallop in his? To whom are they answerable? Clearly they are not answerable to local residents, local councillors or the local Member of Parliament, whom they ignore, misinform or tell lies to or about. How can they be got rid off?

Clearly, they are deplorable custodians of the land in their trust. I recently visited the Godfrey Ermen field. I had been told that a changing room on the field was regarded as a hazard to local children. Residents had therefore asked the playing fields society to secure it. Instead it demolished it, leaving a large pile of unsightly rubble.

The society has repeatedly been asked to secure the fence at the end of Coram street, which I saw when I visited the field. The Coram street outlet is in a deplorable mess and is both a hazard and an eyesore for people living in the street. I am told that, since the debate was announced, some action has been taken to provide a fence, but that it is makeshift and unsatisfactory.

Are we witnessing a scheme to sell land which is a local amenity, the development value of which could add up to millions of pounds? Are we simply witnessing no more than arrogance and insensitivity? I do not know. If Mr. Gallop and Mr. Mellor had been open and forthcoming, concerned local residents might have known. If, without the response of those people, we are forced to place our own interpretation on their role, they have only themselves to blame. If they will not provide answers, I ask the Government to do so.

Will the Government set up an inquiry into the activities of the Manchester and Salford Playing Fields Society and its officers? Will they inform me on behalf of my constituents whether those people have the right to have discussions about selling land which they hold as a charitable trust and which on purchase was vested in the official trustee of charity lands? Above all, will the Government protect an amenity valued by thousands of my constituents and give me the assurance that the Government will not permit the land to be sold?

In a letter to my constituent, Mr. Trevor Mooney, Mr. J. S. Donaldson of the Department of the Environment regional office in Manchester stated:

"Local authorities are generally best placed to make these difficult judgments on land uses on the basis of local needs, policies and priorities."

Manchester city council has made its position clear on these matters. Mr. Donaldson continued:

"The Government have urged local authorities to take into account the needs of the wider community and to consult local sport and recreation interests before allowing recreational land to be developed."

Those are encouraging words and I look forward to further encouraging words when the Minister replies.

My constituents reject any possibility of Godfrey Ermen field being built on. They want the fine lung provided for them by Godfrey Ermen's Trust—they want Godfrey Ermen field to be available for recreational use, as promised at its dedication, "for ever and ever". I look to the Government for the assurances for which my constituents ask and to which they have a right.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Colin Moynihan): I congratulate the right hon. Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) on using this opportunity to raise a matter which is clearly of great concern to his constituents and on putting their case with his usual force and thoroughness. I echo his opening remarks by also congratulating Manchester United, friends and hon. Members who have a personal, constituency and sporting interest in its success this evening.

I well understand the feelings of residents in the Abbey Hey area of Gorton at seeing land which once provided a valuable recreational asset, and which appears capable of doing so again, being closed off and left unused. It must be particularly upsetting to them that the owners appear to be a body whose name suggests that its essential function is to provide recreational land.

The land is privately owned and, like all private land, its owners are entitled to use it as they wish, or not to use it at all, provided that they comply with any planning, building or other controls which may be relevant.

At this point it may be helpful if I say something about the Manchester and Salford Playing Fields Society and its activities. I am informed that the society was funded in 1907 by Mr. Will Melland, a local lads' club manager, with the object of providing playing fields for organised games for children, youths and adults of both sexes within or near the city of Manchester and the then borough of Salford.

The society was registered as a charity and is regulated by a scheme of the Charity Commission dated 23 August 1923. Within the scheme, the society has the power to sell, let, mortgage or exchange lands which are not immediately required or which it may be advantageous to the charity to do so. The power has been exercised from time to time when grounds have been sold and others bought or exchanged.

The Godfrey Ermen playing field was bought by the society in 1928 as a freehold property. Its last tenant was the GEC sports and social club, which relinquished its tenancy in 1985 after having spent several thousand pounds of its own money trying to correct a drainage problem. The society says that, in order to attract another client, it would first be necessary to correct the drainage of the field. Its investigations have shown that the cost of a full drainage system would be prohibitive, and the field has been left fallow while its future has been considered. Because of vandalism, the society has had to demolish the pavilion which stood on the land, and on the likely income from the field the society could not expect to be able to replace it.

Since GEC left in 1985, the society has received only two inquiries about the use of the playing field. As has rightly been said by the right hon. Member for Gorton, the society has, however, had various approaches from property developers and others interested in developing the land. However, it still remains in the ownership of the society. That is the position as the society has described it.

I cannot speak for the society, nor can I say what view the Charity Commission would be likely to take of any proposal by the society to dispose of the Godfrey Ermen land. However, I can say something about the planning background which may be relevant should a proposal to develop the land proceed.

It is clearly desirable that urban land should be used effectively. In urban areas, the provision of open spaces, whether as playing fields or as areas for walking and informal recreation, may be as desirable as the provision of land for houses or even for employment generating development. One of the Government's aims, therefore, is to ensure that recreational land and facilities are not unjustifiably lost. But competing pressures on local authorities for housing and industrial development sometimes mean that recreational land will either be relocated or lost, particularly when it has fallen into disuse.

The clear advice given to the right hon. Gentleman by the local office of the Department of the Environment rightly shows—and I echo the right hon. Gentleman's words—that local authorities are generally best placed to make these difficult judgments on land use on the basis of local needs, policies and priorities and are therefore the authorities primarily responsible for regulating development in their own areas. The planning Acts have given local authorities ample powers to prevent remaining open spaces from being built upon when, having regard to their local development plan and other national considerations, they consider it right to do so.

I understand that Manchester city council did indeed refuse a planning application for permission to build houses on the Godfrey Ermen playing field in 1975. Whether it would do so again if a new application were made to it would be a matter for the council to determine in the light of all considerations that might be relevant at the time. No doubt the council would have regard, among other things, to a policy in the Greater Manchester structure plan, which is still operative, that seeks to minimise losses of land and facilities used for leisure purposes and to encourage the replacement or relocation of those amenities when they cannot be saved. But it would also need to have regard to any other considerations that might be material and it would not be right for me to speculate about what the council's decision might be.

The Government have urged local authorities to take account of the needs of the wider community and, as has been said, it is important to consult local sporting and recreational interests before allowing recreational land to be developed for other purposes. I have no doubt that Manchester city council will do this should a planning application for the Godfrey Ermen land be made. I know that the council takes the loss of recreational land seriously and seeks to have it replaced with land which is equally good in quality as well as in quantity.

Although, as I have said, the decision on a planning application would be for the council in the first place and is not a matter on which it would be proper for me to speculate, I have no doubt that, in reaching its decision, the council would give very careful consideration to the effect of a proposal on recreational provision in east Manchester.

Before a planning application is received, it could well be that the council will have the benefit of a planning policy guidance note on sport and recreation which the Government hope to issue to consolidate and update existing planning guidance to local authorities. The right hon. Gentleman might find it helpful to know that the Government's main agency for advising on and helping to develop opportunities for sport and recreation is the Sports Council, an independent body sponsored by my Department. Through the regional councils for sport and recreation, the Sports Council rightly monitors the provision of recreational land and facilities at local level and seeks to ensure that recreational land is retained.

I sympathise with the right hon. Gentleman's points about his constituency and about the need for adequate provision of recreational land and open space. That is especially important at a time when it is all too easy in built-up constituencies, such as his and mine, with declining school rolls and 1 million fewer children likely to be in school in 1994 than in 1984, for recreational land to be disposed of.

One of the key points about the planning policy guidance note that we hope shortly to publish for consultation, is to reinforce the importance of open land and good recreational space being available. It is so easy to build on recreational land and so difficult to provide for future generations and the numbers of children who would wish to benefit from open space, especially those living in heavily built-up urban areas. It is difficult to undo what has been done by developers.

I have considerable sympathy with the strength of opinion that the right hon. Gentleman has expressed. Those of us who are responsible for sport and recreation and for the education of children must emphasise the importance of open space and recreational land; hence my support for the principle that he has espoused this evening. However, I am sure that he would be the first to recognise that, when wearing a planning hat, it is right and proper that I should not intervene in what might become a case to be considered in due course by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

The future of the Godfrey Ermen playing field, like any other privately owned land, lies primarily with its owners. Like other owners, they are free to make proposals for its future development, and are free also to seek to acquire the property of their neighbours if they consider that that might help them to produce a more acceptable development scheme. Only when they have produced a scheme and require planning permission for it do they need to make an approach to the council. In the meantime, if they choose not to use their land, the planning system cannot force them to use it.

The planning system c nnot force landowners to open up their land for use by the public or to use it in any way that they choose not to do. However, if an authority considers that land is required for development, redevelopment or improvement, or for a purpose it is necessary to achieve in the interests of the proper planning of an area, it may use its powers to acquire it, by agreement or compulsorily, to ensure that it is used properly.

The right hon. Gentleman would not expect me to say whether the use of the council's powers would be justified in the case of the Godfrey Ermen land or of any other land in Manchester. Nor would it be right for me to express any opinion about what might be its proper use because, as I have said, it is a question that could come before my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in the form of a planning appeal or in compulsory purchase proceedings.

The right hon. Gentleman asked whether my right hon. Friend would be prepared to hold an inquiry into the affairs of the society. I understand his wish, and that of his constituents, to have the future of the Godfrey Ermen land resolved, but there is no planning issue at present that would justify intervention by the Secretry of State into the affairs of that private organisation. As I explained, if the society put forward planning proposals for the land, the city council would consider them. If, failing proposals being put to it, the council thought that the planning interest of the community justified it, it might seek to acquire the land. In either event, the matter could come before the Secretary of State and be fully ventilated at an inquiry into a planning appeal or a compulsory purchase order.

For the moment all that I can say to local people and to the right hon. Gentleman is that they should ensure that their views about the land are made clear to the city council so that they might be given proper weight in the event of a planning application being made. If they are concerned that there is a good planning case for putting this land into active recreational use, and are unable to persuade the owners to do that, they must put their case to the council and press it to consider the possibility of acquiring the land.

It is important for planning authorities to move briskly to a position where planning decisions can be taken in the context of up-to-date development plans. The procedures leading to the adoption of such plans offer considerable opportunities for public consultation and for the consideration of objections and representations. Once plans have been adopted, therefore, decisions guided by them are likely to carry considerable weight and to be less susceptible to challenge than others.

The right hon. Member might well consider it in the interests of the people of Gorton, both in relation to the Godfrey Ermen land and otherwise, to do all that he can to encourage Manchester city council to proceed with the utmost vigour and speed with the production of its unitary plan.

A major scheme at Longsight, east Manchester, is the city-wide athletic facility at the former Ducie high school, where more than £1 million has been approved for the reclamation of 6·8 hectares of school playing fields to provide a regional field and track athletic facility.

Therefore, the Government are far from unmindful of the value of open spaces and recreational facilities in inner urban areas such as Gorton. However, local planning problems are essentially matters for the local planning authority, and it remains with Manchester city council to use its planning powers as necessary in order to deal with the problems of individual sites.

Once again, I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman. He has made his case clear, and it is on the record. He has taken the interests of his constituents one step further. I thank him for giving us the opportunity to consider the importance of open space for good recreational provision, to ensure that it is not lost, and to re-emphasise, as he has done, the importance of preserving the quality of life for so many people in inner-city areas by making open space and recreational fields available for the future.

Question put and agreed to.

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

9.34 am

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): I beg to move,

That this House urges British Rail to give full and thorough consideration to proposals for a Channel Tunnel Rail Link based on a junction at Stratford, and to enter into professional discussions with those proposing the Stratford alternative before presenting their Private Bill to Parliament for a decision.

I take this opportunity to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) on his appointment as Minister for Public Transport. I am pleased to see him in the Chamber in what I think is his first parliamentary role in his new office. He enjoys a high reputation in the House for his calm courtesy on all occasions, his ability to listen and his capacity to take action. I know that those three qualities will stand him in good stead in dealing with the issues that are before us.

I shall explain how the motion came up for debate today. Some months ago I proposed, together with leading Members from all political parties in the House and all regions of the United Kingdom, an early-day motion urging British Rail to consider the alternatives before presenting to Parliament its proposals for a channel tunnel rail link. That all-party early-day motion attracted more than 100 signatures and, as is the custom when an early-day motion gains such widespread support in the House, I raised the matter at business questions with my right hon. and learned Friend the Leader of the House and asked him when time might be provided to debate that motion. He gave his customary answer of never. He wrapped it up a little more gently than that and said that the matter would be debated when British Rail came forward with its own proposals.

Good fortune favours a good cause and a few days later I entered my name in the ballot for private Members' motions. Good fortune shone and I was drawn first in that ballot. I was given by fate the opportunity that the Leader of the House was not able to provide to have a debate on the motion.

It is a matter of minuscule parliamentary precedent that this is the first early-day motion which, in its original form on the Order Paper, is being subjected to a full-scale debate. The Table Office tells me that its records for living memory do not show another such instance. Perhaps that is a precedent which might be reflected in other precedents that I shall seek to bring before the House later in my speech. I read on the front page of The Times this morning that the Cabinet will make a decision on this matter next week. I have no way of knowing whether that is true, but it means that this is an opportune moment to air the issues and ventilate the concerns.

Perhaps I should explain how I first became involved in this matter and how my attention was drawn to the channel tunnel rail link problem. It will come as no surprise to hon. Members to learn that it was first a constituency concern. It was felt that there was the threat to my constituency that the British Rail proposals would do a great deal of damage. I make no apology for my concern having been attracted by the parochial principle. However, having looked at the detail of British Rail's proposals, and having seen the effect that they would have not only on my constituency but on south-east England and on the other regions of the United Kingdom, I began to realise the inadequacy of those proposals.

Let us go back to basics. What is the purpose of a channel tunnel link? It should be to offer all parts of the United Kingdom—all the major cities, all the industrial conurbations and all the regions—the opportunity for a fast and direct link to continental mainland Europe. Furthermore, that link should not have a bottleneck or a buffer stop in London but should shift freight or convey passengers from any part of the United Kingdom to any part of continental Europe and link up with the continental rail system. British Rail's proposals singularly fail to do any of those things.

In looking at any route that should fulfil the objective of being part of a strategic European rail network, one has to apply three criteria—operational, financial and environmental. First, any such route must be operationally effective. Secondly, by statutory provision it has to be financially self-supporting. Thirdly, and more important, it must be environmentally acceptable. It must cause the minimum environmental damage for the vast majority of people. The King's Cross rail route, the channel tunnel rail route and the King's Cross rail terminal must be measured against these criteria.

Let us first see whether the channel tunnel plan is operationally effective. We are slightly in the dark because British Rail's proposals are not firmly on the table, but we have seen its first and second compromises and we have an idea of what it is proposing, so we can work on certain assumptions. For passengers, it proposes to run a line that will go through rural Kent from Ashford. It will touch on south-east London, going over bridges, viaducts and embankments above communities, close to schools and into King's Cross or Waterloo stations. This route is called a high-speed or fast-rail link. However, the optimum speed or more than 120 mph cannot be achieved if it is to take that route. The experience of rail disasters and tragedies that we have regrettably seen over the past few years shows that it would not be possible to run passenger trains on such a route. British Rail has said—I think that I am right, but no doubt I shall be corrected if I am not—that the time saved by this construction will be between a quarter of an hour and half an hour. I ask the House, as I would ask all who are affected by this and all who wish to see such a route constructed, whether the environmental damage is not too high a price to pay for such a minimal operational benefit.

The only destination will be London. Passengers who want to go to Edinburgh, Liverpool, the west, Bristol, the south-west or south Wales will arrive at King's Cross station and will have to make their own arrangements, by other transport means, to cross London to, for example, Paddington or Heathrow.

We are uncertain about exactly what the interchange arrangements for trains going north will be, but in most cases people will have to change trains to go beyond

[Mr. Gerald Bowden]

London. Those who feel, psychologically, temperamentally or nostalgically drawn to King's Cross as the gateway to the north will find that British Rail's proposals for a terminal at King's Cross do not meet the needs of a direct route through or around London for passengers who do not wish to stop at London.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Bowden: I shall give way in a moment, but I wish to develop my argument a little further.

British Rail's plans make the assumption that all passengers will be going to London. As I find this slightly strange, I wrote to the Secretary of State expressing my misgivings on 25 August 1989. I received a reply from the then Minister of State on 14 December, in which he said that 70 per cent. of passengers travelling on the route would have London as their destination. I wonder where that figure comes from. If that is the figure on which British Rail and the Department of Transport are working, there is a clear need to examine more closely the assumptions and presumptions on which the route is being built.

One further operational point is worth raising now, although it can be developed later. It is that the track gauge used on the route will not harmonise with the gauge used on mainland Europe. Therefore, far from having a train that goes straight through from Brussels, Paris or Milan, passengers will have to change on to a British gauge train when they arrive here. The idea of a through train for passengers' convenience is lost. I wonder what benefit such a journey will offer over and above the existing travel arrangements by ferry boat and train or by plane.

The provision for freight in British Rail's plans is basically nil. It proposes to run freight over existing lines, and there is to be no dedicated freight route. I find it extraordinary that it should not have looked on this as an opportunity. We convey far less of our freight by rail than any other nation in Europe. We complain about the congestion on our roads and we see great refrigerated vehicles trundling down from the north or Scotland and crossing on the ferries to deliver their merchandise to the capitals of Europe. It is absurd that there should be no provision for putting fish in refrigerated goods trains in Aberdeen and conveying it to the capitals of Europe in less than eight hours. British Rail has not even thought about this and has made no provision for dealing with freight either in London or through London and beyond.

I have raised the matter with British Rail on several occasions and the answer given to me by a board member was that British Rail freight is not "time sensitive". What a wonderful phrase that is. It means that British Rail has no intention of making provision for fast-travelling freight or of competing with road transport to get freight that has to be delivered on time. That stands as an indictment of British Rail's development of its commercial aspects.

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I fully support my hon. Friend's point about British Rail's apparent lack of any positive interest in achieving a proper slice of the freight market. It has given details of how little money there is in moving freight in Britain, but that is not a good enough excuse if we are to solve the environmental problem of pressure on the roads.

Mr. Bowden: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for endorsing that point, with which many hon. Members agree.

Mr. Nigel Spearing: We all agree about British Rail's apparent lack of interest in freight. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that I have had conversations with British Rail officials? It is clear that their wish to concentrate as much traffic in London as they can get away with is related to the need for maximum return on capital invested in the route. Use of stock and lines predicates what they are suggesting, which is not to the convenience of the passengers. Is not that a result of Government financial policy, first, in requiring minimum capital and, secondly, maximum return on stock and route?

Mr. Bowden: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He is one step ahead of me. He anticipated what I shall say in a moment. If I do not answer his point directly, I shall do so in due course. We are in agreement.

If freight and the so-called high-speed rail links are run over existing commuter lines, what consequences will it have for commuters who use those lines and who are suffering and complaining about the inadequacy of service? Operationally, many questions need to be asked. Many defects are immediately apparent, and BR has singularly failed to explain many aspects. Before a decision is made, there should be a searching inquiry into the operational benefits and defects of BR's proposals.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): Before my hon. Friend leaves the question of freight, is not it extraordinary that British Rail has not fully explored the possibility of developing the links between Tonbridge, Redhill and Reading and the midlands and the north?

Mr. Bowden: I find extraordinary not only that but the fact that BR has not explored any of the other alternatives in detail or depth.

Someone said to me the other day, "From the way that you are speaking, it seems you have a vision of a rail network. Is that really a Tory characteristic?" I said, "Yes, I have a vision of a rail network in Britain linking with the transport network in Europe". I find regrettable the lack of vision of BR's board—indeed, its tunnel vision. The only vision that members of the BR board have is that which they see from their boardroom window during their coffee break, when they look out of the Euston road boardroom and see the King's Cross development. I wonder how many members of the board have been on the alternative routes, have even considered the alternative proposals or have visited Stratford. It calls into question the role of the BR board, which is appointed to serve the public interest, and it shows that BR probably relied on so-called experts within its organisation to feed it what it thinks it should be fed.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Does my hon. Friend recall that his point was almost fantastically reinforced by the admission that BR made about its original proposals to drive a route through a brand-new housing estate in my constituency? It admitted that nobody had been down the chosen route. What on earth would possibly induce it to consider any alternative?

Mr. Bowden: It is a pity that BR did not travel by train along the proposed route because it would have found that there are some defects in it.

I turn to the second criterion—finance. Section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987 makes it clear that the route should be self-financing. The route chosen by BR goes through mid-Kent and some of not only the most beautiful but the most expensive land in the country. It is also some of the most difficult terrain on which to engineer and construct. That causes additional expense. The route goes through housing estates which BR had not realised were there. How could it cost the compensation claims without knowing where the line of the route went? That leaves one with grave misgivings about its professionalism in costing the route.

Undeterred, British Rail sought the public sector partner that it had been encouraged to seek for finance. Although I was not party to the discussions, it was clear that the public sector partners with which it flirted were unable to see how the route into King's Cross could possibly be self-financing. One way or another, all partners failed, except Trafalgar House. For the convenience of hon. Members I shall not refer to the corporate names that consortiums have used because we are all confused about Eurorail and Kentrail. Eurorail was formed with Trafalgar House, which agreed with BR to construct the route and that it would be self-financing. It was not surprising to the other groups that had made a bid that, having opened the books, Trafalgar House found that there was no way in which the BR-preferred route could be self-supporting or self-financing and that it would be necessary to seek public money.

I shall deal briefly with the environmental criteria and how BR's preferred route measures up to them. The route drives through some of the most beautiful landscape in the south-east of England and some of the most beautiful farm land, which we see as our heritage as well as protective of rural life and fostering rural communities. It drives through small communities, small villages and densely populated south-east London urban areas. It does so not underground but, in many places, above ground, with all the environmental damage and danger that that implies. It will cause not only long-term nuisance and environmental damage, but during the construction period it will cause considerable short-term nuisance.

I know that only too well in my constituency. Warwick gardens—I see my constituency neighbour, the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) in her place—is temperamentally Peckham but technically Dulwich. I speak for Warwick gardens, which people believe is in the Peckham area. Some years ago, it was run down, but it has regenerated itself by the commitment of those who live there and those who have moved in. The human tragedy of the threat of blight caused by these insensitive proposals shows that there is something gravely wrong with planning a route without consulting in advance the communities that it deeply affects.

I know that many other hon. Members are aware of similar anguish being expressed by communities affected by the threat of blight. Those who participated last year in the marches through London and saw the banners from all parts of the community and all parts of the south-east realised that there was a great force of opposition to such a wasteful threat to the environment.

As I have said, there is no real benefit to the commuter, to the continental passenger or to the freight shipper in the King's Cross terminal and route proposals. Who does benefit from the route? I am indebted to my hon. Friends the Members for Christchurch (Mr. Adley) and for Harrow, East (Mr. Dykes) for prompting consideration of that point. I discovered that an amendment to my early-day motion 692 used the phrase "developer-led". I was amazed by the use of that phrase and decided to delve a little more into what that might mean.

A letter was sent to hon. Members who had signed the early-day motion, with the exception of the six leading signatories, by Mr. J. Palmer, the managing director of European Rail Link, which is a part venture with Trafalgar House and BICC. He used that same phrase in attempting to disparage the alternatives. He said:

"Alternative proposals for direct links from Stratford to the city, King's Cross, Heathrow and the Midlands, North and Scotland, appear to have been grafted on to developer led plans."

It appears that that piece of jargon is used not only in our Order Paper but in the wider world. That prompted me to trawl through the evidence given to the Committee considering the King's Cross Bill, which began its work last June but which has not yet reported. The report of its proceedings is interesting to read, not so much because of the questions that were answered, as because of those that were not even asked. On Tuesday 12 December Mr. Godfrey Bradman, one of the developers, was asked in some detail about the terms on which British Rail would develop the King's Cross site and how Trafalgar House was linked with that development. The Chairman said:

"Those are assurances that we have been given by BR in this Committee; we want to know whether they are convincing to you."

Mr. Bradman replied:

"I think what you need to have if I may say so is Mr. John Fletcher of Eurorail to whom I spoke as recently as yesterday; he has said that he would be very happy to come and give evidence".

My hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), a member of the Committee, took up that point. It draws to the attention of the House the unsatisfactory way in which fact and truth emerge from such questioning. He said:

"No, every time we come up against a brick wall it is suggested we call somebody else for evidence."

That shows that we should more closely investigate the terms under which King's Cross is to be developed and the implications for the channel tunnel rail link—or, the other way around, the implications of the channel tunnel rail link going into King's Cross and the proposed development of that site.

I believe that such tactics are called the salami strategy. It is tactically useful for British Rail to produce a Bill that covers only the tunnel aspect. It makes no mention of what happens after the tunnel or any further along the line, British Rail having obtained the tunnel, the next slice of the salami is the terminal, which is to be at King's Cross —yet still no mention is made of how one gets between one and the other. When those who might be on the route between one and the other attempt to make representations, the narrow interpretation of the locus standi rule, imposed by the Court of Referees, denies hon. Members whose constituencies will be affected the opportunity to give evidence, to petition or even to ask questions of that Committee. For that reason it would be useful today to pose the questions that the Committee should have asked the developers.

What is the relationship between the developers of the King's Cross site and British Rail and its venture partner Trafalgar House? Is Trafalgar House a developer connected with the King's Cross development as well as being part of the joint venture arrangement? What is the value of the development at King's Cross? The rental value per square foot in the location of King's Cross may be £x. If, however it is developed as a terminal for the channel tunnel rail link, tenants and their clients could simply go downstairs, get on the train and be in Paris or Brussels in two and a half hours. The rental value would then be not £x but £3x, £4x or £5x per square foot. The value of the King's Cross development depends very much upon the likelihood of its becoming the channel tunnel rail link terminal. I wonder whether there is a sine qua non in the arrangements, whereby if there is no rail link the development might not even take place, or if it did, not on the same terms.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on drawing first place in the ballot. As he knows, I came second. I have already told him that had I been first, I would have given him half the time available. Whether he will reciprocate is another matter.

The hon. Gentleman referred to salami tactics. There is a problem for potential supporters of the Stratford interchange. If the line runs from the channel tunnel to Stratford, is there a danger that the next slice of salami from Stratford to King's Cross might not be constructed? The hon. Gentleman appears to be considerably downgrading the King's Cross terminal. The stretch from Stratford to King's Cross would be very expensive. I represent constituents in the east midlands whose line is not electrified, so they are already at a disadvantage. We are worried that the line might go only to Stratford, and not on to King's Cross. If that happens, it would not then continue to the east midlands and most of the traffic would go up the east coast. A number of people who are potential supporters of the hon. Gentleman's arguments wish him to clarify that point.

Mr. Bowden: I do not know how long the debate will take, but obviously it needs to run long enough to allow all who wish to speak to do so. I hope that I have as much generosity of spirit as the hon. Gentleman and, if it were within my power, I would give half of my time to him as he said he would give to me. However, that is the world of hypothesis.

We must question the relationship of the developers not only with British Rail but with the Government. They want to develop a line and a terminal. They have international tenants waiting who would love to have an international office block with fast links to continental Europe. However, they have found public opposition on a scale which I, for one, have never previously encountered. People who are inexperienced in protest have turned out on Sundays and marched through the south-east in lines of tens of thousands to tell the Government that the plans are unacceptable. That public opposition is no mean feature.

There is also the question of delay. Every time that occurs in the making of a decision, then, to use a developer's phrase, the window of opportunity is closed in respect of making a letting to the right tenant. There is also the cost factor. It is clear that the link cannot be constructed in the way that British Rail proposes without money from other public funds. I suggest that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, put yourself in the developers' shoes. What should they do? Perhaps I should not put you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, to that inconvenience. Instead, I shall put myself in their shoes.

Perhaps I should declare a past interest. Twenty years ago, I was involved in the property development industry and know it to be an honourable profession, and one which makes a great contribution to the nation's well-being. Having served an apprenticeship in that profession, I subsequently taught young people who were destined to enter it, and was able to pass on some of my own experience.

I place myself in the shoes of developers facing the problem of public opposition, delay and cost, and wonder how I would tackle them. I shall paint a scenario. First, I would circulate rumours among the press and other media to the effect that, "The Minister must give the go-ahead at once." Secondly, I would spread the rumours that, "The Minister must fund the project with some public money." Having let those two rumours mature for a little time, I would beat a path to the Minister's door and deliver my ultimatum, saying, "Pay up now, or we pull out—and then where will your Government be?" Having allowed him to digest that, I would try the soft touch, saying, "I know that you must avoid section 42 of the Channel Tunnel act 1987. I know that financing is statute-barred and that you cannot be seen to devote public money to the project. But let us dress it up in some way. Let us call it an environmental grant. Let us say the money is being used to minimise the impact of the rail link on the environment. If you don't like that, let us call it a commuter services upgrading allowance. Let us say that the money will be used to improve Network SouthEast to the benefit of all, so that it will not be seen as a subsidy for the channel tunnel link. Wrap it up in pink paper, tie a ribbon around it, and the public will feel that they are giving a present to a good cause."

That is how one might try to sell such a proposal to any Minister. One would put the wind up him and then show him the way out. But decisions made in those circumstances would be bad decisions, reached without considering the defects of the proposals or the benefits of the alternatives. No amount of public money can make a bad scheme good. In those circumstances, it would be a financial insult to devote public money to an existing environmental injury.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): Has my hon. Friend taken into account that the channel tunnel project itself has grotesquely overrun its original financial projections? It is extremely unlikely that shareholders will ever see a return on their initial investment, and they may be required to put up another £1 billion or £2 billion later this year. As a consequence, when considering the rail link, one inevitably asks why the Government should become involved in putting up taxpayers' money for what will be a high-risk project.

Mr. Bowden: And an inefficient high-risk project, at that.

I turn to the proposed procedure and timing. Right hon. and hon. Members are more than familiar with the timing requirements of private Bills. They must be deposited by 27 November, and then lie on the Table until the end of January, to allow objections to be raised and petitions to be presented.

Mr. John Prescott (Kingston upon Hull, East): The hon. Gentleman raises an important point, but I am not sure that his facts are right. I raised that aspect with the appropriate authorities of the House, and established that there are a number of precedents for depositing important Bills after November, particularly with a Bill that is likely to span two parliamentary Sessions. That allows proper consideration to be given to alternatives.

Mr. Bowden: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his remarks. No doubt those who take decisions about when the Bill is deposited and how it is to be dealt with will take them into account. However, they do not detract from the point I was about to make.

When the Channel Tunnel Bill came before the House, there were 5,000 petitions against it, which took a considerable time to screen and hear. If there were 5,000 petitions against the tunnel itself, how many more petitions will there be against a Bill to provide a rail link with it through Kent and south-east London into King's Cross? One could probably multiply those 5,000 petitions by five. The likelihood of there being 25,000 petitions against such a proposal is no more than a conservative estimate. It would take us from, say, January 1991 until June of that year to hear all those petitions and to have them screened by the Court of Referees.

The Bill might receive its Second Reading in June 1991 and then go into Committee. The King's Cross terminal Bill went into Committee last June, and technically it is still in Committee one year on. The proposed new Bill might emerge from Committee in 1992 and be reported to the House—but June 1992 is also the buffer stop for a general election. If we believe that we can solve the problem, we must solve it in a way that allows us to persuade the electorate that we have the right answer. It would not just be an election issue in the south-east—it would be the election issue.

The alternative might be a hybrid Bill. Wearing my property developer's hat, I might say to the Minister, "Come on. Join in on this one. Make it a hybrid Bill. Get your commitment behind it. Make your payroll vote support it, and we will get it through." That might work in certain circumstances, but I am told by more experienced people with wiser heads than mine that success in politics is often, if not always, a matter of timing.

The timing of a hybrid Bill would present exactly the same problems as those that I described in relation to a private Bill. It might have a certain amount of Government commitment and would technically be a Government Bill. However, that would not lessen the number of objections and petitions, which I believe would still number around 25,000—so its Committee stage would not be shortened. Even a hybrid Bill would still be a major issue in the next general election.

There is an alternative strategy and alternative routes that command support from the majority of people involved either in the route alignment or at the destinations. The alternatives should be examined, because there is no way that British Rail's Bill can be put through before the next general election, or even in time to straddle that election.

Why not consider the alternatives, which might command support, might not generate public opposition, might meet the self-financing cost requirement and might obviate some of the delay?

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): Before the hon. Gentleman turns to specific alternatives, does he agree that the timing of the debate is all-important? If British Rail made an announcement within the next few weeks without taking into account what he and all hon. Members anticipate will be universal disapproval for the likely proposals, and if it ignores voices from all parts of the country asking for a total rethink, which will benefit all the regions—Scotland, Wales, London and the south-east—it will cause British Rail, the Government and any other supporters of BR immense difficulty.

I know the hon. Gentleman well enough to think that he is trying to get a solution that will be acceptable throughout the House and the country. Before any specific alternatives are canvassed I hope that the key point in his remarks will be taken up—that British Rail must not ignore the strongest possible pleas for it to stop going down a second wrong route and must listen to the unanimous call for it to consider all the alternatives suggested in the House today.

Mr. Bowden: I think that the hon. Member is saying that timing is all-important, as I suggested a moment ago, and that there is no point in foisting the wrong route upon the country because BR needs to make a decision now. That would only generate further delay because of opposition along the route. If the right route is found, one which fulfils the three criteria, it will obviate the need for delay and will have widespread acceptance. Therefore it could go through the parliamentary procedures with far fewer obstacles and with a fair wind from both sides of the House behind it.

Four main alternatives have been suggested in detail. They are known by the acronyms TALIS and RACHEL. Those two routes are the work of groups which are not professionally sponsored but comprise professionals with experience of civil engineering and railroad building. Indeed, I believe that some had experience of building railways in other parts of the world and could therefore claim to have more professional expertise than many people in British Rail.

In addition to those two route alignments, two other sponsors made proposals—Ove Arup, a prominent civil engineering consortium and Manufacturers Hanover Trust, which has experience of bringing together groups for this type of development. There are two professional consortia and two professional proposals. It is not the point of my speech to single out which proposal is better. That needs to be done at a more professional level within British Rail and the Department of Transport. However all the proposals have one thing in common—they recognise the concept of a Euro-rail link and the need for a strategic integrated transport plan for the United Kingdom and the rest of Europe, and they all recognise the need to avoid every piece of freight and passenger going through central London whatever its destination in the United Kingdom.

All the proposals start with a route alignment through north-east Kent rather than mid-Kent and through south-east Essex rather than into King's Cross and one knows not where from there. Benefits flow from that route. The consortia should capitalise on any agreement among themselves. Taking the route through north-east Kent is the idea that they all seem to have in common. Thereby, they will take the route through one of the most deprived parts of the south-east where there is a fair amount of derelict industrial land and the local communities could benefit from an economic uplift. Any such route, with its freight and passenger transport potential, would introduce new jobs and give a boost to the industrial economy. We should consider the issue not only from the benefit to be gained from operation of the route, but from the intrinsic value it will have for the community through which it passes.

Something someone said a moment ago reminded me of an early meeting I attended with the protest group in which I take an interest, Pearl, which is concerned mainly with the Warwick gardens area. We went to a meeting at British Rail headquarters and met a group of middle managers—not the top brass. Someone said that the TALIS and RACHEL routes ought to be considered. British Rail said that it had considered one—TALIS, I think—and was now considering the other. We asked who was looking at it. Was it an independent consultant? BR said, "Yes, Transmark is looking at it."

I found out that Transmark is a subsidiary of British Rail and its affairs are mentioned in the BR balance sheet. Surprise, surprise—in the first instance Transmark came up with a report on TALIS, I think, saying that that proposal was rubbish. We then discussed the RACHEL route and asked what would happen if Transmark, British Rail's subsidiary, found in favour of RACHEL or found good points in that proposal. The phrase, "fell about" describes the way that British Rail's middle management reacted. They laughed and slapped their sides at the idea that Transmark would find in favour of an alternative. Someone pressed the point and asked the question again. I remember the substance of what was said—although the person with whom I checked takes a different view. I think that one of them said, "We would lose our jobs," and another said, "We should all resign." Whichever way one looks at it, they were saying that their employment with British Rail would somehow terminate. I cite that as an example of the fact that one cannot rely on British Rail having an independent assessment of the alternatives unless it is forced to do so.

A biblical quotation describes the situation but it escapes me. I do not remember the exact words, but I suspect that part of Transmark's job was to point out the speck of dust in the eye of the other proposal, to distract attention from the lump of concrete in its own. I think that that is the modern translation rather than the original authorised version, but the sense is there.

Are the alternatives operationally effective? Let us consider the proposals on an operational basis. They would allow freight and passengers to be conveyed at speed to and beyond London along routes which are easy to engineer. They would provide a direct bypass to the city for passengers and freight not destined to remain in London. Although there is no point or purpose in trying to suggest costings today, it is obvious, even to those not experienced in property values, that acquiring industrial derelict land in north-east Kent will be cheaper, in terms of the amount of compensation that will have to be paid, than acquiring highly expensive farming and residential land in mid-Kent and south-east London.

If Stratford were a passenger terminal, people would be able to park and ride—to go by car to Stratford, as they might to an airport. They would not be able to do that at King's Cross. What is even more important, Stratford is not regarded as a terminal. Manufacturers Hanover Trust and Ove Arup, the promoters of the two main schemes, have said that repeatedly. In all their communications with hon. Members and at all their meetings they have made it clear that they do not believe that Stratford should be a terminal but that it should be a bypass junction for those who wish to go beyond London.

An essential feature is that there should be a connection between Stratford and the west country. Passenger and freight trains destined for the west country would go from the channel tunnel port to Stratford, turn left by means of a constructed tunnel or existing route, to the City—perhaps via Fenchurch street to King's Cross, touching the King's Cross development—and then carry on to Paddington, Heathrow, Bristol and the west. An essential feature of the strategy is that the route from Stratford to the west would take in mid-town London, west London and the City. It is that essential feature, put forward in the alternatives, which British Rail has consistently denied is there. By means of misinformation and disinformation it has insisted that that is the greatest inadequacy and deficiency of the alternative proposals.

There would also be a not too difficult method of taking passengers and freight to the north-east and the north-west. Stratford could be linked with the routes to the north, either by a route north of King's Cross or by going through King's Cross. That would make Stratford a junction point in a national network; it would not be just a terminal. That is the most important aspect of the alternative proposals.

A passenger and freight alignment along the lines that I have suggested could be designed to the continental gauge. The United Kingdom route would then harmonise with the European gauge and there would be no need to change trains when passengers and freight arrived in this country. That is the main benefit of the alternatives. Routes along those alignments and the development of Stratford would generate their own financial support.

Mr. Richard Holt (Langbaurgh): For the benefit of my constituents in the north-east, can my hon. Friend confirm that his plan would not be to the detriment of my constituency and that it would not slow down the opportunities for development in the north-east, bearing in mind in particular the Government's mule-headed attitude towards a proper motorway to the north-east of England?

Mr. Bowden: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for allowing me to elaborate on that point. British Rail's preferred route with a terminal at King's Cross, would be of little benefit to those in the north-east, certainly to industrialists who want to shift freight. They would have to find a way to get it to London and then to a terminal, be it at Willesden or Stratford, so that their freight could reach the fast link network. If, however, a freight line went through Stratford, freight could be sent to the rest of the country on the continental gauge. It would be a progressive development. The Stratford option offers more to those in the north and west of England than British Rail's proposals. British Rail has sold its proposals as being the only way in which the north-east, the north-west, Scotland and the south-west can be accommodated. The reverse is the case.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): The hon. Gentleman referred to the progressive development of his preferred option. Hon. Members with constituencies in the north believe that the planning by both the Department of Transport and the Government has failed to take account of the need to integrate transport systems as quickly as possible with the channel tunnel link. We need access to the tunnel at the greatest possible speed so that the north of England and Scotland can take advantage of all the benefits. We must not be marginalised, simply because we cannot gain access to the tunnel.

Mr. Bowden: I am grateful for the opportunity to try to dispel any misapprehension that there may be in the north about my proposal. Many of us came to the issue because of the need to protect our constituencies from the threat, but the more that we looked at the proposals the more we realised their inadequacy and how little, if anything, they offered to regions other than London and the south-east. The movement of freight and passengers to the north, the north-east and the north-west, bypassing London, could be based on Stratford without the delays, bottlenecks and the interchange of trains that would be necessary at King's Cross. It would allow for the development of lines northwards on a gauge that harmonised with the rest of Europe. Passengers and freight from the north would be able to stay on one train and not have to get out of it until they reached their destination in Europe. That objective is enshrined in the alternative proposals. If the hon. Gentleman has not received the details that make that clear in black and white, I shall ensure that he receives them. The proposal based on Stratford offers infinitely more to the United Kingdom than British Rail's King's Cross proposal.

I do not propose to deal in detail with the Ove Arup or the Manufacturers Hanover Trust proposals. They have been sent to hon. Members and I know that many of them want to speak in the debate. However, I end on a note that is often struck in the press: the French do it differently and the French do it better. They have adopted a strategic approach to the transport link—a grand design that links up the whole of France. They have decided that if there is to be a link between Lille, Bordeaux, Lyon and the channel tunnel, the people who live in those towns will not want to go through central Paris. They have bypassed Paris by means of a line to the east. Interestingly enough, our alternative proposals bypass London with a line to the east. The French avoided taking the line through the centre of their capital—in contrast to what British Rail proposes to do at King's Cross.

The French have also optimised the opportunity to bring prosperity and industry and therefore to improve the economy of depressed areas. Certain towns in northern France have begged the authorities to allow the rail line to go through their region because it would lead to spin off developments. The Stratford alternative would offer similar opportunities. It would go through land that does not enjoy the benefit of the prosperity that is found elsewhere. Moreover, the French have decided to link the line to the Disney theme park to be built in France. Proposals are afoot for developing Rainham marshes in Essex as an international theme park. The alternative link would take passengers from continental Europe directly to the theme park without passengers having to go to King's Cross and change trains to get to the Rainham area.

The alternative proposals ought to be considered seriously by British Rail instead of being rubbished by it in a programme of disinformation and misinformation to hon. Members suggesting that the only solution is the one that British Rail prefers.

The more one considers the proposals, the more one realises that they are wrong. I have not approached the matter negatively. There is a way forward. British Rail should talk seriously to the promoters of the alternative proposals and use a clean slate, without its existing commitments and loyalties pre-determining its approach. We need to find an alignment that serves those who wish to come to London, keeps away the threat of blight from the areas that many of us represent and provides a system that not only is part of an integrated road and rail transport infrastructure in this country but is linked to an integrated transport system for Europe. This is not an idealistic grand vision but a realistic way of looking at the problem. If we miss this opportunity, the effects will last for many years, at great expense and resulting in great tragedy.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Many of us would echo the sentiments expressed in the closing remarks of the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) and would congratulate him on his choice of subject. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), in whose constituency the possible Stratford terminal will lie, I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his motion. In the past hour and 10 minutes, he has ranged over the problems and shown us its many facets. My only quarrel with an otherwise excellent round-up concerns the gauge—the loading gauge in the United Kingdom is more restricted than that on the continent, but the track gauge is not; it is the same—Stephenson. British Rail has said that it will run British Rail size coaches to the continent but the reverse will not be possible. There will be some restriction on freight but, happily, I do not think that it will be necessary to change trains or bogies as the hon. Gentleman suggested.

We welcome the Minister of State to what I believe is his first main debate on these matters. He will listen, as his predecessor did, but, ironically, his predecessor's political beliefs have put him and the Government on the hook. The hook on which the Government and British Rail are impaled is their refusal to provide the capital infrastructure for a new, 21st century railway line, coupled with—a poisonous combination—the requirement or preference for some developer-led finance. Those two matters form the basis for the hook on which not only the Minister and the Government but the hapless officials of British Rail are constantly twisting to every turn either of St. Bartholomew's hospital or of the various developers who come along.

I do not have all that much sympathy for British Rail officials, who do not seem to run our railways as well as they might, but the Government are breathing down their necks and telling them to make all the economies that they can. By chance, I have just returned from Victoria station, having travelled overnight by train from Brussels.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): You old tripper!

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend says that I am a tripper. I was listening to the golden, honeyed words of Mr. Giscard d'Estaing and Mr. Jacques Delors—but that is another topic.

Had I travelled overnight to or from Brussels 55 years ago, I should have had a much better deal, as I did a few years' ago when I could go to Victoria station on foot, climb aboard a sleeper and wake somewhere past Lille. Alas, the night ferry has disappeared and its substitute is poor. The overnight train advertised as travelling to places such as Cologne and Brussels stops at every station between Bromley and Faversham. Returning this morning, we had a two-hour wait at Dover and joined the first commuter train at 4.45 from Dover Priory, which was naturally liable to be overcrowded as it neared Victoria. That is the standard to which British Rail treats us.

I commend the fact that British Rail is to have a spanking new vessel on which to put a few coaches. You may have thought, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that in a few years' time one would be able to stroll over Westminster bridge, climb aboard the new super-train at Waterloo and perhaps settle down to a nice dinner, just as you do on your way to Bristol and as my hon. Friends do on their way to places such as Manchester, but no such luck! Having spotted the design of the new super-trains, I wrote to British Rail about this. British Rail replied that it could not afford the lavish restaurant facilities that it has on its domestic services, so there will be meals at one's seat only rather like the service on the otherwise excellent TGVs and on aeroplanes, which people wish to avoid.

Mr. Rowe: The vision that the hon. Gentleman conjured up was enchanting, but he left it unpeopled. The congestion that will be caused by using Waterloo as the central terminal for the cross-channel traffic will mean that the hon. Gentleman will be dodging his way across Waterloo bridge among a horde of pedestrians.

Mr. Spearing: The hon. Gentleman may be right. That is yet another limitation to the plan.

I suggest that there are four desiderata with which we all agree. First, we must have a 21st century railway which fits in with the continental system and our own and must be built to have minimal environmental impact. Secondly, that railway will serve the whole of the United Kingdom. Thirdly, the arrangements for stations in London—I emphasise the plural "stations" and not "terminal"—must meet the strategic planning needs of London and Londoners. Fourthly, there should be sufficient through-running of passengers and freight across or around London.

As I understand it, most of those criteria are not permitted by the infrastructure costs laid down by the Government.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): None of them is.

Mr. Spearing: My hon. Friend says that none of them is permitted. That shows the inadequacy of the present plans. The King's Cross solution is impaled on the developers' hook, off which they may have been pushed by the intervention of St. Bartholomew's hospital.

There is also the disadvantage of the south London problem. One either uses the route south from King's Cross on the existing overcrowded lines of Thameslink and Network SouthEast, which would add difficulties and use scarce tracks, or one has to build expensive tunnels through the water-laden gravels of the area. British Rail seems to have tried to get round the problem by what is known as the Swanley solution, which makes one's mind boggle. The idea of having a "terminal" somewhere near the M25, not coming through London on dedicated tracks to link up with the rest of the national system, seems rather strange. There would be a link, of course, but nothing more than that provided by the South East Chatham Railway nearly a century ago.

The south London problem is, in a sense, the bottleneck and the strategic geographical problem on which most of these matters turn. The hon. Member for Dulwich listed the names which have become familiar—TALIS, RACHEL and Ove Arup. As he rightly said, the south London problem is avoided by having a north Thames crossing, somewhere between south-east Essex and Barking. I think that strategically that is probably right, although I dissent from the idea of its being developer-led, whether in Rainham—a controversial development—the Maidstone parkway or nationally.

If we are to get it right, I suggest that bringing greater development in and around the railway to fund it would denude other parts of Britain of opportunities, and is thus not something that either the House or the country would wish to see. Therefore, while TALIS, RACHEL and Ove Arup are on the right lines, I still believe that any contribution made to them by developers, or any dependence which is placed on their developments, is almost certainly wrong.

What we might describe as the north Thames solution has other implications, especially for London's strategic planning. The hon. Member for Dulwich touched on that when he referred to Stratford, an area in Newham which is not necessarily opposed to having an intercontinental or a continental station. Stratford's links are already pretty good. The House has passed a Bill for a direct extension of the Jubilee line from central London to Stratford.

Of course, the Government may choose CrossRail, which is part of the London scheme. If they did, not only would there be three direct links from Stratford into central London, by the Central line, the Jubilee line and CrossRail—I assure Conservative Members that CrossRail would take only 10 minutes to reach the west end or the City—but the line could go out to Heathrow, up to Stansted or through to King's Cross secondary station with all the links to the north and the west. What better solution could there be? If CrossRail was used initially as that link, the costs might be less than for a dedicated track, although I agree that ultimately London should have dedicated tunnels, preferably to the Union Internationale de Chemins de Fer B-plus loading gauge.

Mr. Allen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and I apologise for having missed the first few minutes of his speech.

What worries me and other people in the east midlands is the concept of a secondary station at King's Cross. We are worried that virtually all rail traffic will be filtered out at Stratford and that there will be very little incentive to complete an effective link from Stratford to King's Cross and St. Pancras, which is one of the main routes to the east midlands, including Leicester, Derby and Nottingham. As I said when I intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), we already labour under the problem of not having an electrified line to the east midlands main line. Would not these proposals present a further problem?

Both the hon. Member for Dulwich and my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) need to reassure people in the east midlands that the channel link will be completed through to King's Cross and St. Pancras, that it will be a first-class link and that not only will traffic go through the channel tunnel, but much of it will be enabled to come up to the east midlands. If my hon. Friend fails to do that, we would be as well to stick to the present option.

Mr. Spearing: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention because it allows me to describe what I believe is the geographical and operational position, which is not entirely clear to some of my hon. Friends representing the midlands and the north. The fears about through-running could apply to King's Cross and to the existing ThamesLink routes, as currently planned. The problem that I dealt with earlier when I intervened in the speech of the hon. Member for Dulwich is that British Rail wants to get the maximum return from "high quality" coaches zipping to and fro, rather than from through-running. So, we have that problem in any case.

Personally, I do not want to see any disadvantage in the Stratford case—and I do not think that there is any. As I have said, even without CrossRail, there are already physical links from Stratford to most of the lines to the north-west, the midlands and the great north. With a few little additions, that line could do as well as a dedicated track. The guts of the problem lie in persuading British Rail and the operators to through-run.

My hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) may like to know that I have always backed a rolling plan for electrification, but British Rail and the Government seem to have got it wrong. The east midlands main line is a four-track main line and would, I understand, provide one of the best options for the modification to the UIC B-plus gauge for the whole country. My hon. Friend can be assured that, whatever the problems, the Stratford option would not add to them and would, I believe, be the correct strategy.

One problem which has not so far been divulged about TALIS, RACHEL, Ove Arup and the north Thames solution—other than the unsatisfactory nature of British Rail's "Swanley Solution"—is that British Rail has signed a contract with Eurotunnel with regard to train paths to the tunnel. We know that the tunnel is to be shared between the so-called "ferry traffic" and the so-called "railway traffic". I understand that British Rail has purchased or has an agreement about the proportion that it will run, and no doubt has also made a commercial agreement, which is doubtless highly secret, about how much it will pay. It has been suggested that any other route suggested by any other promoter could not have access through the tunnel section because British Rail has already written the contract.

We seem to be back in the 19th century with railway Bills, tracks and all the rest of it. That is one reason why the Government must come clean. If they have a hidden card in their hand—which may be revealed in the House today if the Minister confirms it or otherwise in his reply—however good all the alternatives that have been suggested, they will not wash because the agreements have already been made.

I conclude by assessing the present position as I see it. British Rail and others are planning routes that we do not want. A number of other routes might be better, but at the moment it looks as though we shall not get them. We do not have any strategic planning for our railways for the 21st century. My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) has some sound ideas about that, but we have not even reached the stage that the French and the Germans reached, not now but a century ago, when they planned their railways properly. Those who know railway history may recall that even the great Mr. Gladstone was inclined to say that, like the telephone and postal services, railways were so important that they should be publicly planned and even publicly funded. If that were the view now, we should not be discussing the Government's inadequate and feeble planning with which we are confronted at the moment.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. It is evident that many hon. Members wish to speak, so I hope that Members will help each other by making short speeches.

10.57 am

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): As the Member for a north-west constituency, I want to make the point that the siting of the second London terminal has major implications for all regions north of London and for Scotland. The House knows the important part that industry and business in the north play in the economy of the country. My own region, the north-west, makes the second highest regional contribution to the gross domestic product.

Like other regions north of London, the north-west wants to play its full part in exploiting the opportunities that the single market will provide, but it cannot do so unless first-class communications are available, both from the region to London and the south, and from the region directly through to the continent via the channel tunnel.

The transport infrastructure will be a key to capitalising on the economic opportunities of 1992 and later. The north-west has the most to gain and the most to lose from the channel tunnel. It is the largest single market area for international rail freight and passenger services outside the south-east and stands to gain from both the increased export opportunities and the increased opportunities for tourism. Many more visitors are already coming to the region.

There is real concern in the north-west and, I am sure, in many other regions, about the delay in reaching decisions on both the siting of the tracks to and from the tunnel, and the location of the new rail terminal in London itself.

Decisions must be taken or confirmed now, with national rather than purely London and south-east interests in mind. For that reason I must express my anxiety that we are debating a motion which raises fresh doubts about the location of the new international rail terminal for London. It opens up again the controversy about the siting of the international terminal. King's Cross has enormous advantages over Stratford and the location of the terminal there is important to the national interest. That is the overwhelming opinion in the north-west.

[Sir Peter Blaker]

It seems ridiculous to suggest, as I understand is being suggested, that there should be three London terminals —Waterloo, King's Cross and Stratford. Surely, King's Cross, with its central location and with the nearby stations of Euston and St. Pancras, is the hub of London communications. Some 60 per cent. of all London underground stations, through five main underground networks, are connected directly with King's Cross, and the proposed travelator, linking it with Euston, would certainly enhance its role. Another advantage of King's Cross is that by a minor upgrading of the existing route through west Hampstead, it could, and with little additional expenditure would, have a direct rail link with the west coast main line.

I welcome British Rail's plan to use King's Cross as the London international terminal and I hope that we can give our backing to it so that it can proceed as quickly as possible. However, my enthusiasm for British Rail in this connection is tempered by the lack of planned investment in effective, high-speed, rail tracks coupled with suitable terminal facilities in the north-west. My parliamentary colleagues and I will make the case for progress with increasing vigour over the coming months. I, and no doubt my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Miscampbell), will continue to press the case for electrification of the line from Manchester to our constituencies.

I again stress the need to make real progress quickly with the development of our communications from the north and the midlands to the channel tunnel.

Mr. Tony Lloyd: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Sir Peter Blaker: I should prefer not to give way as many hon. Members wish to speak.

A decision on the siting of the London terminal needs to be taken without more delay. My belief and that of the vast majority of those involved in commerce and industry in the north-west is that King's Cross is the natural and sensible choice for the new London terminal. I hope that today's debate will show the strength of that view and the anxieties of hon. Members that this motion, calling for yet another alternative to be considered, will only delay matters further.

11.1 am

Mr. Gordon Oakes (Halton): I welcome the speech of the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker) and echo his remarks. Like him, I represent the north-west—I am a Cheshire Member of Parliament—and we are extremely worried at the delay which could result from today's debate.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) in a clever intervention said that if the House today makes it clear that it is dissatisfied with King's Cross and British Rail, and is, therefore, by implication in favour of Stratford or some other alternative, British Rail will have to listen to that opinion. That may be true. The danger is that few northern Members attend the House on a Friday. It is a London day, for logistical reasons. It is not because northern Members are idle, but they must return to their constituencies, whereas London Members can attend to constituency duties at the weekend. It has always been so. I and, no doubt, the right hon. Member for Blackpool, South, the hon. and learned Member for Blackpool, North (Mr. Miscampbell) and my hon. Friend the Member for Worsley (Mr. Lewis), have stayed because we fear that delay or worse could result from this motion.

No matter what has been said about British Rail, and I endorse a great deal of what was said about its management, King's Cross is a natural point for the north of England—not only the north-west, but the northern consortium which includes Yorkshire, Lancashire, Merseyside and Cheshire. Those regions are in favour of King's Cross because of its obvious geographical location and its obvious advantages for passengers from the north.

It is deplorable that British Rail will not provide more through trains in the early years of the tunnel. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) and I both want to be able to get on a train in Manchester or Crewe and get off in Paris or Brussels. We do not want to have to change, but British Rail is not providing that initially. Therefore, if I must make a connection in London, probably at Waterloo because it will be the No. 1 terminal, I must get from Euston to Waterloo which is not an easy journey. The route is the same as that I use to come to the House and involves the Northern line. On the other hand, King's Cross is only the next station on the underground from Euston. At a pinch I could walk there and I could certainly get a taxi within a few hundred yards of Euston station.

Many hon. Members' views about Stratford make it sound desirable, but is the finance there for it? If there was a link and one could take a train from the north to the continent which would bypass London completely, that would be ideal, but I see no proposals before the House which lead me to believe that that is likely. What, then, is left? We have the proposals for King's Cross.

King's Cross is a major station serving London. Its communications by underground with the rest of London are excellent. It has communications with the north-west, Cambridgeshire, East Anglia, Scotland and Northern Ireland. It is the terminus for those trains. To lay doubt on the proposals, as today's debate may well do, could delay matters considerably. We shall be talking of a second London terminal not in the closing years of the 1990s, but in the next century. That is our fear because we need the service now.

The channel tunnel is a national project, not a London link. It will link the whole of the United Kingdom to the whole continent. Would that we had had the sense to behave like the French in looking at it from a national point of view or, indeed, from an international or European view. That is far more logical than our scrappy proposals.

I am about to sit down as many hon. Gentleman——

Ms. Harman: And Ladies.

Mr. Oakes: —and Ladies wish to speak. Hon. Members, especially those who represent the north, Scotland and Northern Ireland, think that the proposal for King's Cross is the best that we have now. We talk at our peril about scrapping it. The probable cost will be delay far into the next century before we get a proper second London terminal.

11.7 am

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on coming top of the ballot and on presenting his case so forcefully this morning. However, he slightly misled the House by suggesting that the gauge was not the same. He was right to say that the wagon gauge was not the same, but certainly the rail gauge is the same. Just as bridges and roads are being upgraded to cater for road traffic, so the gauges will be upgraded for wagons. In time we shall have complete similarity throughout the country. It is not the intention that people will have to change trains to go through the tunnel. The only changes likely to take place would involve the crew, but, as I understand it, the passengers will go right through, certainly from London to Paris, on the same train. I hope that eventually they will be able to go through from Manchester to Paris, and other locations. I fully accept the point so eloquently made by the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) about the need to get on with the job.

I believe that my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich may have got the wrong end of the stick about freight. British Rail is expecting a considerable income from freight. Whether it should be transported at the same speed as passengers is a matter of debate and cost. There are provisions at present for freight to be transported round this country at considerable speed, but it is a matter of how much the customer is prepared to pay, as in anything else.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich was slightly unfair to the members of the British Railways Board. It is easy to fire at and criticise people from the House. We all need criticism to keep us on our toes, but we must not go too far over the top. I know that British Rail has provided facilities for me to see various other alternative routes. I am sure that the same facilities have been made available to members of the British Railways Board, who travel on trains just as we do. One should not believe that they use a different form of transport and do not have any experience of trains.

Since the autumn of 1987, no fewer than 42 locations have been considered for the terminal. King's Cross was eventually chosen. Ten of the 42 were considered in detail. Some 70 routes were studied to get passengers from the channel tunnel, through London, to other parts of the United Kingdom. Some 300 options were considered.

We must accept that British Rail has gone to some trouble to explore the matter thoroughly, and the route through Stratford was one option considered. It would be wrong to suggest that the matter has not been thoroughly considered. It certainly has, but there is a time factor. One cannot go on considering issues for ever. If we were to consider all the 300 options in the greatest detail, we would still be discussing the matter in the year 2020. By that time, the French and German railways would be carrying passengers and freight at enormous speed round the country, and hon. Members would be complaining that our unemployment figures were rising and we were not getting a fair crack of the whip in Europe. They would be asking what we were doing about it. A number of hon. Members on both sides of the House have already expressed concern about whether the decision should be delayed, and whether we have already spent too long considering the issue.

I know that parts of Kent and Essex, and many other parts of the country, are particularly beautiful, and should be treated with proper respect and care. However, we must acknowledge that the other proposals put forward by a number of consortia that my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich mentioned have not gone into great detail. Therefore, colleagues have not been inundated by protests from local groups in their area because we do not know where those lines are proposed and exactly what the problems would be.

Certainly, any alternative has to include provision for trains to go through, and right into the centre of, London. It would be wrong to say that because a scheme had been put forward that got passengers to Stratford more cheaply than it could get them to King's Cross, it should automatically be considered on a par. It cannot be, and hon. Members on both sides of the House have explained why. We must take account of that.

There is great concern at present that various parts of this country will miss out unless we get on and achieve our objective. There are certainly problems enough without prolonging and delaying the matter unduly. The French and German railways have made massive strides forward. I think that it was the hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) who seemed to think that French and German railways were so much in advance of ours, and had been for 100 years. I do not agree. German railways snake round the rivers and take a long time to get from A to B. A system has been introduced in the past few years, and we must admire what has been achieved in that time, but 20 years ago Germany's railways were no better than the British Rail network.

Mr. Spearing: I would not wish the hon. Gentleman to misunderstand what I was saying. The standard of service may not have been as good, but about a century ago there was a national plan for railways in Germany, which we did not then have.

Mr. Thorne: That may be true. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman would also agree that we introduced railways into the world in the first place. One of the disadvantages of inventing something is that one does not get the same distanced planning as if one is considering it from the outside. Other countries, such as France and Germany, had those advantages, and certainly took advantage of our experience. That was how they could achieve their planning objectives.

Various points have been made about independent assessments and theme parks. Visitors to theme parks are welcome, but they will not form a major part of the traffic that is likely to come from the continent. In addition, I am sure that such people would want to stay in hotels overnight and would be likely to go to the main centres for that purpose.

Compensation is an important issue. My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich hit on an important point when he mentioned the comparison between the income that one might expect from the development of King's Cross, and that which one might expect from a development at Stratford, and whether the income was an attractive proposition and should form part of a programme. Yes, certainly those factors should be considered, and I am sure that many hon. Members would wish to attract some of that business and prosperity to different districts for their own reasons.

[Mr. Thorne]

However, we must consider the matter as a whole. We must consider not only the connections of the railways to central London but the road networks. Many people feel that the road networks are lacking and are already far too congested. Many people will want to go to the terminus by taxi and we should have to make provision for them to get by taxi to and from Stratford, if that were the alternative. Therefore, in our costings we must allow for an improved road network, whether to King's Cross or Stratford. That factor must be taken into account.

It is important to compare like with like, and if we are to consider the alternatives—we would have to do so quickly—we need more detail than has been supplied. It is easy to put up nebulous cases and say that they would definitely be better. Unless they are detailed, we cannot compare or cost them properly. We must take those important issues into account.

Mr. Rowe: British Rail persistently makes that point, which is substantially disingenuous. It has consistently blocked any alternative proposal by saying that it will not consider it. It is therefore putting on any alternative contractor the obligation to spend tens of millions of pounds to carry out the detailed work required to achieve what my hon. Friend wants. It then argues that it has always said that it will not consider that alternative.

Mr. Thorne: We have to accept that British Rail has considered 300 alternative routes from the channel tunnel into and serving London. British Rail has done a great deal of work already, and some routes have been examined in considerable detail. Any proposals that are put forward have to be more positive than they have been so far. Any detailed proposals of which British Rail is not aware would certainly be considered. However, we have to examine the reasons why people are promoting certain alternatives. It is not fair to expect British Rail to spend unlimited money on considering every proposal that has been put forward, as there are often special reasons why various individuals and companies are promoting certain alternatives. Those reasons are not necessarily in the best interests of British Rail or the country. We have to be fair in our assessment. I accept that it is an expensive operation, but one has to be fairly definite and positive in one's criticism of people with a fair degree of expertise and about the grounds for refusal.

I know that other hon. Members wish to speak, so I shall not detain the House any longer except to say that it is important that the facility should not be unduly delayed. The vast majority of hon. Members seek a solution sooner rather than later. Every additional delay is likely to increase construction costs and the cost to the British economy unless we are able and and ready to face the challenges of being part of Europe in the 1990s and beyond.

Miss Kate Hoey (Vauxhall): I too, congratulate the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on initiating the debate. It is a timely opportunity. In the past, I have shared many platforms with the hon. Gentleman in fighting British Rail's proposals. As he said, initially we approached the discussion with constituency concerns in mind. I represent the views of many people in my constituency, particularly around Clapham and Waterloo. In addition to examining British Rail's proposals from the point of view of our constituents, we must also consider what is best for the country generally. It is clear that operationally, financially and environmentally, British Rail's proposals will not benefit all parts of Britain through increasing our links with Europe.

I shall say a few words about my constituency concerns, particularly those involving Waterloo. We are discussing alternative proposals for King's Cross and Stratford. Let me remind the House that some years ago it was decided that Waterloo should be the first main terminus for the channel tunnel. Many of us are doubtful about the proposals and mistrust British Rail because we were told then that there was a need for only one terminus which had to be at Waterloo. The people of Waterloo and Lambeth said that Waterloo was not the right place for the terminus.

There is now a still greater need to consider what has already been decided for Waterloo. The current design for the Waterloo terminus would cater for 10·5 million people. That was confirmed to Lambeth's planning committee as recently as last autumn when Lambeth was considering the detailed planning application for the terminus. I was pleased that the borough has resisted the temptation to support any moves to get that terminus built. A public inquiry starts in a few weeks' time.

However, British Rail's own transport forecasts now show the original estimates to be wrong. We now know that there will probably be up to 40 million passengers using Waterloo when the channel tunnel opens in 1993. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) travelled through Victoria this morning; anyone who travels through Waterloo knows how chaotic it is there. In addition, the Jubilee line extension to Stratford through Waterloo and the long-awaited improvements to the Northern line will undoubtedly produce a significant increase in the number of passengers using the station. Given the likely increases in the number of passengers due to the channel tunnel, increased numbers of tube and rail passengers and, we hope, more people using public transport, it is clear that Waterloo is not the right place for international travellers to arrive.

Lambeth is refusing to be bulldozed into granting planning permission because the design of the terminus does not in any way come up to the standards that would be needed for the numbers of passengers using it. The taxi and car drop-off and pick-up points are woefully inadequate, there is insufficient allocation of time for passengers with luggage who may have a problem with language and may not be able to ask the way, the coach drop-off point is a long way from the terminal, making it difficult for elderly or infirm people, and the plan provides for only one additional escalator on the underground system. British Rail has stated that it expects 50 per cent. of passengers to arrive and depart by tube. Anyone who travels in and out of Waterloo by tube knows just how congested it is.

The plan does not take into account the effect of the community around Waterloo which has fought off increasing developments in the area. Even at this stage, if we need a terminus at Waterloo, let us at least get it right and not push through proposals for an inadequate terminus. However, I believe that there is a no need for a terminus at Waterloo. If we were to have a public inquiry and consider the overall benefits of moving to the Stratford initiative, it would not be necessary to spend that money at Waterloo. The Government have recognised that the position has changed. In their planning guidance, Waterloo is almost the only part of London where the Secretary of State has been quite specific in his directions.

One of the dangers of British Rail's proposal is that it has not really examined the movement of freight. It has been very much a plan for passengers. The present plan is to run all the freight along the two existing south London commuter routes in and out of London. British Rail has admitted that it will be able to use those routes only at night as they are already operated to capacity during peak hours because of London commuter and passenger traffic. All the channel tunnel freight would converge on Clapham Junction station before crossing the Thames to a depot at Willesden. Given the number of recent rail disasters, I share the anxieties of the hon. Member for Dulwich about safety when that railway line operates at full capacity. Eurotunnel has said unofficially that it is in its interests for British Rail to develop a freight plan that will maximise the project potential.

The people in Lambeth, Waterloo and Clapham believe that the route via Stratford must be examined by British Rail and that we must have a public inquiry into the matter. I understand the worries of hon. Members from the north and midlands about benefiting from the tunnel. The only reason for the channel tunnel is that it will benefit all the people. Because we are worried about the delay we might push through something that is not the best way forward. I hope that the debate will give the Minister something to think about. I hope that he will listen more attentively than his predecessor and will perhaps move slightly towards the feelings that I understand the Secretary of State may have about the Stratford route.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I welcome the debate and the attention called for by my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) whose constituency is also affected by British Rail's current proposals. However, I view with dismay my hon. Friend's proposals for full and, no doubt, lengthy consideration. My constituents and I are fed up with continuing delay during which numerous rumours of alternative routes have been bandied about. There is hardly a square kilometre of my constituency that has not been the subject of splendidly disruptive proposals. It seems that every civil engineer in the country has made a bid not only for a railway line but to gain the reputation of an up and coming expert on the prospect for a grand renaissance of our railways. Locally, we resent being the guinea pigs for these no doubt stimulating exercises.

The villages of Istead Rise and New Barn have been in the firing line for the longest period. They may be suffering from war weariness, but they remain vigilant in the battle for their environment. Ever since the first announcement burst on us in October 1988, those villages have had to contend with the professional approach of British Rail to these matters—and we all know how professional that is.

The original proposals provided for a towering viaduct overlooking the village of Istead Rise, with the railway slicing on through various houses, having previously carved out the Meopham cricket ground at Nurstead. I am glad to tell the House that, following detailed representations by Gravesham borough council and the Istead Rise rail action group, with which I have been closely involved, some major modifications have been made.

The Nurstead cricket ground will now remain unmolested. The North downs tunnel would be extended westward to Thirty Acre Shaw between the villages of Istead Rise and New Barn. The south side of Istead Rise would be saved in the long-term by a cut-and-cover tunnel, although likely to be disrupted in the medium term by a major construction site in the Cobham valleys, during which time the Wrotham road would be heavily loaded by construction traffic, particularly removing tunnel spoil.

Both the west side of Istead Rise and New Barn would be exposed to noise from the cutting westward from the mouth of the tunnel, and the permanent disfigurement of the current rural landscape which separates the two villages. This is the major bone of contention with British Rail for my constituents both in Istead Rise and that part of the village of New Barn in my constituency. Were this deep cutting to be covered, I think that much of the local opposition would evaporate.

We do not even know if British Rail intends to stick to its current proposals. Rumours abound that it might move its route southwards, bringing relief to Istead Rise and New Barn, but transferring the anxiety to the parish of Meopham. Proposals have been made which involve tunnels under Luddesdown and Meopham near the parish church, and yet another running under southern Luddesdown and Meopham near Culverstone. Any of these proposals involving tunnelling the entire distance beneath Gravesham would be preferable, provided the tunnel is bored from the Medway and any ventilation shafts and construction sites are sensibly located. That site is well to the west. I know that Meopham parish council and its dedicated sub-committee remain vigilant on those aspects of the matter. I hope that British Rail's preferred route can rapidly be announced to relieve the anxieties of most of my constituents, and to concentrate the minds of those who are directly in its path.

Various other interests have formulated plans. The most serious of those are the plans of the Ove Arup partnership. In respect of Gravesham they propose to cross the borough from east to west along a line slightly to the south of the A2. They would emerge from a tunnel at Scalers Hill, Cobham, having tunnelled under Cobham golf course. They would then travel westward in a cutting past Singlewell, Marling Cross, and Watling street, Gravesend, cross the Wrotham road by viaduct, and then progress on an embankment past the Gough Cooper, Henley Deane and Pepper hill housing estates in Northfleet.

This scheme would have a serious impact on the local environment, and its four tracks would add to the considerable amount of noise arising from the A2 motor road. The partnership's proposals for an urban fringe woodland between railway and highway are imaginative, but we will need much analysis about the effects on the environments of the urban areas that I have just mentioned, as well as of the village of Istead Rise lying to the south-east of the embankment.

There are yet other schemes, notably that of Rail-Europe, the principal of whose routes ploughs through the parish of Higham. It even outlines a route carving through the urban areas of both Gravesend and Northfleet. It has not done us the courtesy of drawing that route to our attention or saying whether it is on stilts or buried or merely ploughs straight through the houses and gardens of thousands of my constituents.

Many hon. Members were eloquent about the economic and employment advantages of massive railway projects, particularly for the midlands, the north and Scotland. They have to bear in mind the heavy environmental cost for the people living in the transport corridors. A prerequisite has to be the protection of the environment. The House will have to ensure that this prevails. Any developer of a railway project, British Rail or any other, will have to come to the House to obtain a private Bill for any such project.

The private Bill procedure is an extremely onerous one, and any promoter would be well advised to do his environmental homework well in advance. I am encouraged by the Government's statements on the need for an environmental assessment of any project, and for high environmental standards. Unless these needs are met, my hon. Friends from Kent and I will give any Bill a very rough ride. I am also encouraged by the announcement by the Minister's predecessor about the establishment of a committee to recommend a national noise insulation standard for new railway lines. We look forward to its report.

Kent is under threat. We are being assailed by development in a multitude of forms, which is putting terrible pressures on our green belt. Our constituents fear erosion and blows from gandiose projects such as this one. It is high time that the project was finally crystallised, so that we know the precise detail of the challenge that faces us.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): I shall not detain the House long, but as a Member from Wales I feel that our problems in relation to the channel tunnel link have not been considered. Someone from further afield can perhaps look at such problems objectively, although it is difficult when faced with the multiplicity of plans outlined by hon. Members who feel that their constituencies and constituents are under threat.

The basic question to be addressed is why we are concentrating entirely on the situation in London. Surely the whole of the United Kingdom should be considered in terms of the link to the tunnel. It is salutary to realise that those of us who live in Wales, in the west of England and in parts of the south-west midlands, have no prospect whatever of a direct link to the tunnel. Because of the Government's investment criteria for British Rail, our railway lines are not to be electrified, so we cannot have through services.

Why should trains go through London at all? Why not bypass London with high speed trains and link the rest of Britain with an orbital rail bypass and, with an integrated transport system, and include Heathrow and Gatwick? The existing track could be used for trains to go into the London terminals at a lower speed. There would be much less disruption with such a system.

The French are in the middle of constructing a Paris bypass for TGV which will cut two hours off the journey time between Lille and Lyon, and will link with Charles de Gaulle airport. That is an integrated transport system. I do not know why we have such a lack of vision about a 21st century rail transport system. Most of us want through trains to the continent and are not interested in stopping off in London, which has its own problems—it is full of people and traffic, with all the resulting pollution. We want to get past all that and on to Paris, Milan or even Moscow on the rail system.

British Rail is constricted by the Government's policy and, in particular, investment criteria. The insistence on the 8 per cent. return on capital investment is distorting all British Rail's decisions. One has only to look at King's Cross to see that, because it depends on the 125 acres of land to finance the investment programme. That is crazy. The correct procedure would be to use a cost-benefit analysis, which is the criterion used on the continent.

The channel tunnel rail link is dependent on section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987, which precludes public investment in the line. That ought to be repealed—private developers cannot finance the project properly and some are already screaming for public money to bail them out—if it is desirable to bring a direct route to London.

Confronted with the facts and the options, Waterloo is clearly the answer. I understand the feelings of the hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey), but she must understand that putting a block on Waterloo would cut out a direct route to the channel tunnel for Wales and the west country. Nevertheless, I understand the effects that a terminal at Waterloo will have on her constituency and how sensitive the matter is.

The King's Cross option will prove difficult for the west because we shall need a link in London Paddington to get there. The same applies to the Stratford option, because we do not know whether there will be the money to invest in a link between Stratford and Paddington and, for those in the north, between King's Cross and Stratford. If the terminal is to be built, we need guarantees about such links. Otherwise, we shall be left out on a limb and passengers will have to use the underground system, lugging baggage around, which would be unacceptable.

I was a member of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs which considered the channel tunnel links with Wales a few months ago. The Committee opposed construction of the Stratford terminal because it believed that a link from Stratford to Paddington would not be built. However, the Ove Arup proposals may offer some hope.

Another possibility is the existing rail link from Tonbridge to Reading, which has been used from the channel ports for a long time. In the first world war, soldiers were carted from Dover to the north on it. If it could be done then, it can surely be done now. I understand that the problem with that link is that a bridge in the Redhill area needs to be rebuilt and redirected.

Miss Hoey: I do not understand the hon. Member's point about Waterloo because whenever I have gone to the west, I have gone from Paddington.

Mr. Livsey: British Rail has assured us that there will be through trains from Wales to Waterloo and only a single platform transfer. The hon. Lady should be aware of that proposal, which British Rail has even put in writing.

Environmental considerations are also extremely important. In Wales, the opencast mining executive of British Coal is proposing to demolish houses, chapels, farms and other buildings to dig coal out of the ground.

Those who live in the south-east should be aware of the environmental rape with which we continually have to put up. One hears little about that. The south-east has a number of choices, and it needs to consider them. The main choice is between rail and road. If there is not to be a Berne-gauge system of UIC for freight, much of the freight will be decanted on to lorries at the channel ports. There will be even more lorries than there are now in Kent —and even more motorways, each of which takes up 25 acres of land per mile. The south-east has to think seriously about whether a rail system would not be preferable, as it would take up much less land, lay much less concrete and overcome many problems. The road lobby is railroading the rail system out of existence and priorities must be sorted out. We need greater vision in relation to the environment because it is well proven that railways do not affect the environment as much as roads. There is far less pollution.

The Ove Arup proposals are a move forward towards an integrated plan for a rail strategy. They are based on Stratford east, and a terminal at Stratford east will be useless without links with the rest of the rail system. The Ove Arup proposals have such links and will avoid tunnelling in south London. There will be less environmental disturbance. Although a London rail bypass would be the better of the two options, some of the other proposals on the table are not worthy of consideration.

Mr. Michael Alison (Selby): In seeking to strike a note that I fear my hon. Friends the Members for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) and for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) will find a little discordant, I want to stress that I am not insensitive to the environmental and other pertinent considerations that press on them and their constituents and on other colleagues, who represent constituencies in the south-east of England. My advocacy of King's Cross against Stratford as the inter-connecting rail link does not prejudge any consequential environmental considerations that my hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham mentioned as being an essential and proper prerequisite of a private Bill that may have to be introduced.

I want to stress the relevant and pertinent considerations that press on those who represent constituencies in the north, particularly Yorkshire and Humberside. In a nutshell, Stratford will represent a set back, a profound disadvantage and a sharp detriment to the economic life, prospects for jobs, prosperity and economic growth in areas of the north such as Yorkshire and Humberside, which already lag behind the south in those respects.

The railway industry is undergoing something of a rebirth. Huge capital sums are being invested throughout Europe, even in the United States of America, revitalising and refurbishing the attractions of rail travel. The unique relevant feature that the railway offers compared with other modes of transport is a city centre departure and arrival point. The logic of urban industrial growth has produced an uncovenanted bonus for railways: railway termini find themselves at the centre of the urban web and not on the periphery. King's Cross, Euston, St. Pancras, Paddington and Waterloo are at the centre of the urban web by the mere logic of industrial and urban development.

No colleague who has faced the prospect of a two-hour air journey and has had to spend an hour struggling on the periphery of the city to get to the airport can underestimate the value of the centre-of-the-web feature of a modern railway terminal.

Mr. Tony Banks: I respect the right hon. Gentleman's views because he normally speaks for God in this place. How can he dismiss Stratford in a couple of sentences with the sweeping assertion that the development there would lead to jobs and opportunities being lost in the north? Where did he get that information from, and will he give some substance to the point he made?

Mr. Alison: The hon. Gentleman is being hazardous in imputing to me some divine access or inspiration. His facetious remarks may expose him to considerable risk. I disclaim any inspiration for the modest analysis that I am giving. I shall try to elaborate, for the purpose of the hon. Gentleman, why I believe that Stratford is unsuitable.

British Rail can offer only two trains a day to the continent of Europe via the channel tunnel on the east coast main line from the north. Northern business men travelling to Europe and European business men travelling to the north must take the ordinary InterCity train and change in London to complete a journey from Rome or Milan to the north.

Can anyone imagine the psychological and physical disincentive effect of having to change trains at Stratford rather than King's Cross to link with the InterCity service? Having entered a modern, air-conditioned, high-speed train from Paris, Milan or Stuttgart, anticipating the excitement and novel experience of travelling through the glorious countryside of the south-east of England or northern France and the unique railway experience of racing through the new channel tunnel at up to 300 km per hour, imagine the psychological effect on the now thoroughly enchanted and delighted railway passenger of being deposited among the dreaming spires of Stratford.

Can anyone imagine a more delirious anti-climax than arriving at the dreaming spires of Stratford, after all the excitement of travelling through the channel tunnel and north-east France or—starting from York—across the glorious scenery of northern England? As a loading of delight upon delight, on arriving at Stratford the passenger has the unique enchantment of a high-speed tube. Could anything be more calculated to delight the European passenger than the prospect of catching a high-speed tube, which has an average speed of 15 mph, with stops, to link with high-speed trains on the ordinary InterCity services?

Diverting passengers from Europe who cannot use the through-train services, of which there will be so few, to Stratford and forcing them from channel tunnel trains on to the London underground system, stopping at every stop to get to King's Cross and catch the InterCity service, is a nightmare and a total disincentive. No serious passengers travelling from Rome or Milan will bother to do so. They will miss out the north of England. Why should they expose themselves to those primitive forms of urban inter-communication?

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): My right hon. Friend is living in the past. The modern business man from the north who wishes to travel to Milan will fly. Why should he bother about a long and tiring railway journey?

Mr. Alison: My hon. Friend, as a southern Member, does not appreciate the extent to which we in the north are still subject to a thrombosis in economic travel and development. There are no great airports anywhere near Yorkshire and Humberside. Yorkshire folk must travel to Manchester, 40 or 50 miles down the rather less-developed road system, to reach a decent international airport. There is a positive attraction in train travel because of the inner-city location of termini. That gives it a great advantage over air travel. The throwing away of the centre-of-the-web feature of railway termini is a profound disadvantage to the idea of locating the system at Stratford.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The right hon. Gentleman has become carried away with the prejudice of his argument. People will want to go direct to the continent without stopping in London. It matters not whether they travel through Stratford or any other station. They want to get under the channel and away. Other people may want to do business in London on the way. They can go to King's Cross, do their business and continue on to the continent. It is not the simple, only one desired form of travel option that the right hon. Gentleman suggests. That is a false analysis of the travel needs of people from his part of the world, who travel to Europe and sometimes stop in London. Stratford would not prejudice that, because they could travel to the centre of London.

Mr. Alison: The hon. Gentleman's analysis is wrong. There are two options: first, the through connection, ignoring London—there will be only too few such trains—and, secondly, the non-through connection—the ordinary InterCity train service. A business man travelling from Milan to the north of England or from the north to Milan must stop in London to change trains. No business man from Milan will expose himself to the necessity of travelling from Milan through the channel tunnel to Stratford, where he will have to catch an underground train to get to the inter-connecting InterCity train service because there will be no ordinary InterCity train service based at Stratford. Investment in an InterCity network link would be too expensive. The business man will have to take the underground to get to King's Cross to catch an InterCity train to the north. It is a profound throttling of the prospects of business men in the north getting into Europe and of the European business man getting into the north. I urge my hon. Friends to major on the King's Cross link, not Stratford, at all costs.

12 noon

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I had not realised that the right hon. Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) was so much of a detached snob. Perhaps he has for too long answered questions on behalf of the Church Commissioners. I should like him to come to Stratford some time. I admit that it is not the most beautiful place on earth, even though I represent it, but his remarks were unworthy of him and unfair on the people who live in Stratford and in the east end in general. The hon. Member for Orpington (Mr. Stanbrook) was right to say that the right hon. Gentleman is living in the past. He might have the time to gaze out of the window when travelling through the rolling countryside, but those who want to come to this country to do business want to get here as quickly as possible—and, given the right hon. Gentleman's views, probably want to get away as quickly as they can.

I welcome the Minister to his new office. I understand that in the past he was an accountant. That makes two accountants running the Department of Transport, as accountancy is also the Secretary of State's background. I look forward to the day when an engine driver or a bus driver is running the Department. Then, perhaps, we might have someone who is more acquainted with the needs of the travelling public. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), who will be the next Secretary of State for Transport, will bring to the post some of the qualifications that he has acquired.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on choosing this subject for debate. It gives the Minister an opportunity to acquaint himself with a significant issue. It is opportune that this important debate should be the first in his new post. As a number of hon. Members have said, it is a most unsatisfactory way to construct an enormously significant transport infrastructure. It is piecemeal, shoddy and inefficient. The Government are to blame for the mess in which we all now find ourselves. It is the most significant transport investment decision this century, but the manner in which the Government have approached it, right from the beginning, is grossly inadequate.

We are often lectured by Conservative Members on the efficiency of the private sector. They could hardly use the fiasco of the British contribution to the tunnel and the rail links as a sign of its efficiency. Original costs have escalated wildly from £4·8 billion to £7 billion and rising. The developers are now saying to the Government "Bail us out or it goes down." It is one of the flagship developments. The Prime Minister has stood at the Dispatch Box and made speeches throughout the country extolling such a wonderful example of the private sector. Now the Government have to bail it out.

I hope that the Minister will say whether a report in The Times today is true. It states:

"The Cabinet will decide next week whether to back proposals for the 68-mile Channel tunnel rail link with the injection of a £400 million subsidy, informed sources say."

Mr. Spearing: Bernard Ingham.

Mr. Banks: It was not Bernard Ingham; the article said "informed sources".

I want to know whether the article was true. The Government made clear statements that there would be no public money—our money, taxpayers' money—for the project. We have always argued that that was not the way to do it. If taxpayers' money is now to be used to bail out the developers, who obviously had their calculations wrong, what will be the return for the British taxpayer? I am not in favour of bailing out private developers. Let them go bust and then we can pick it up for nothing. The Government must remember that their main fiduciary duty is not to private developers, but to the British taxpayers.

If we contrast the attitude of the British with that of the French, we come out rather poorly. There is close co-operation between the French Government and SNCF, the French nationalised railway system. Speaking as a citizen of this country, I feel almost ashamed that the SNCF has volunteered to put up the money for the British side of the infrastructure investment. What on earth are we doing? Must we rely on the French to put up the money for the British side of the development? The Government are reducing Britain to a lesser development status. That is atrocious and the Government should be ashamed of themselves.

The French work in close co-operation, but British Rail is narrow minded and the Government are bigoted. It is a decision of national and international significance. It is far too important to be left to British Rail and a bunch of bureaucrats with their limited and unimaginiative approach. Why should we take anything that British Rail says as right? It said that there would be only one London terminal and gave us estimates for the number of passengers. That has changed. Before it has even constructed the first terminal, it wants a second. It says that it must be at King's Cross. How can anyone trust British Rail's planning process? There should be an objective assessment of what is needed—not necessarily for London or even the south-east, but for the country as a whole, and, indeed, for the whole of Europe. That is something that only the Government can do. They cannot leave it to British Rail.

British Rail says—and for once I have some sympathy with it—that it is not the strategic planning authority for the country, or even for London and the south-east. It is a transport undertaker which must get a return on capital. It wants to get people into the middle of London because it says that that is the best that it can do. There are other options, but it is neither authorised to consider them nor does it have the resources to finance them. The Government must take responsibility.

Although I criticise British Rail for its blinkered approach and the way that it deliberately shut off the other options, in the end the Government must take responsibility. The decision is so vast and so important that it cannot be left to British Rail. Indeed, the Government cannot leave it to British Rail and the developers because they now have to put in money. That will be humiliating, although they will probably try to dress it up. They might say, "Actually, we are not contravening section 42 of the Act; it is a subsidy to pay for additional environmental works that we have asked the developers to undertake." Perhaps the Government will be honest for once and say that they have to repeal section 42. If they do, they will run into a great deal of trouble, not only from Opposition Members but from many Conservative Members.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) made a good speech in which he expressed the fears of many people in the north. They want to know that, whatever option is preferred, it will not be to their disadvantage. The various proposals surrounding Stratford, especially that from Ove Arup, would not disadvantage the north, whether it be the north-east or the north-west. Indeed it would be positively advantageous. When I went to see the previous Minister for Public Transport—before he was given the black spot by Blind Pugh and told to convince the nation why the poll tax is such a wonderful thing; I think that he should have stuck to transport—I told him, as I want to tell the new Minister, that there must be a proper assessment of all the options. We want the Government to take the lead in making an objective appraisal and in saying, "This project affects the whole country, so we must take an overview and not leave it entirely to British Rail."

If that were done, the issues raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton could be properly addressed. He expressed concern that our debate could influence British Rail in reaching its decision. British Rail has not been influenced by good sense and reasonable argument up till now, so it is unlikely to be swayed by anything that is said in this Chamber. My hon. Friend can be assured of that. We must hope instead that the debate will influence the Government, because it is they who sit at the centre of the web and who can determine whether the project will be a success or a lamentable failure that will have to be carried over into the next century.

The proposals made by Ove Arup are worthy of close scrutiny. They answer all the points made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Halton and would involve both King's Cross and Stratford, which would be in the interests of us all.

The London borough of Newham has worked closely with Colin Buchanan and Partners in making an assessment of Stratford as a prospective site. Newham and the surrounding borough councils—including Redbridge, within the constituency of the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne), who criticises the Stratford proposal —support the Stratford option. Even then, it is not a London but a national issue. Newham has been in the forefront in trying to persuade British Rail to choose Stratford. A development there, linked with additional necessary investment—particularly in cross-rail—would be advantageous to the whole country and to the whole of Europe. It would also be a cheaper option not requiring demolition of property on a large scale. Two hundred acres of British Rail development land is already available at Stratford.

For all those reasons—because the Government should be involved, because of the international nature of the project, and because Stratford is ready and willing and able to accommodate a terminal—I congratulate the hon. Member for Dulwich on his proposal. Even if today's debate does not in any way influence British Rail, we must hope that the new Minister will take a fresh look and seize the opportunity to make a great name for himself.

12.12 pm

Mr. Mark Wolfson (Sevenoaks): I start by congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on achieving today's debate, which is extremely valuable and could benefit the whole country. It is also a pleasure to welcome my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport, in his new role. We had close dealings when he was Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Health, and we are likely to do so again in respect of the vitally important issue that is the subject of today's debate, and which also affects my constituency.

I bring to the House the apologies of my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), who wanted to be here today but has urgent other business with British Rail in his constituency this morning.

I want to focus on the strategic issues involved. History tells us—and so does experience today—that railway development, like road development, can give the lead to economic development. Other hon. Members made the point that alternatives to British Rail's present proposals could benefit parts of south-east England which need further stimulation of economic development and would in no way be detrimental, though others have argued otherwise, to the development of the midlands, north, and Scotland.

I am no advocate of the north Thames alternative or of the Stratford alternative, unless at the same time there can be a sensible cross-London link enabling passengers to alight either at King's Cross or at Stratford. A development at Stratford would affect the eastward move of London. We must remember the strategic point that London is moving east. In 50 years' time there may be a very different perception of what constitutes the centre of London compared with today, bearing in mind developments at Canary wharf and docklands. Because at this stage British Rail is viewing the development entirely in terms of its existing network, and because of British Rail's background and raison d'être, it tends to perceive everything in terms of rail transport. I call on the Minister, as I have done frequently in the past, to take a strategic view instead.

Historically, railways have led economic development. It is interesting that in France the Government grant for TGV trains was based on making them take the lead in developing those regions of France which needed it most. I refer not only to the north of France but to the Brittany peninsula, where the TGV Atlantique has been constructed with regional development very much in mind.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich spelt out the three criteria against which he measured British Rail's present proposals—operational benefits, costs, and environmental factors. I will not repeat the concerns that he expressed, and which I share, but I greatly fear that British Rail's proposals—which we do not know in detail, but of which we have a pretty clear picture—bear all the hallmarks of a British bodger's job on a herculean scale simply because strategic issues were not addressed before decisions were taken on the exact route and what it should achieve.

I wish to highlight one anxiety affecting my constituency before addressing wider points. The expected route is likely to run through my constituency, where there could be an international station, which I am led to believe might be located within a five-mile radius of Swanley. Any such plan will run counter to all existing green belt policies and to the Kent structure plan. It is bound to bring major building development to the vicinity in future years, and the prospect of such growth will rightly arouse much controversy. Here we have the prospect of growth being centred on an area where it is neither needed nor planned for. If anything, there is over-employment in that area, which for many years has been designated green belt for controlled development only. If British Rail's development was allowed, it would open a Pandora's box and act like the magnet that large airports have become. Such magnets are needed, but not in that location.

I ask my hon. Friend the Minister to give careful consideration to the argument that whatever type of Bill is brought before the House, be it private or hybrid, to enable the rail link to be constructed any development apart from the line itself should be subject to the usual planning requirements and therefore a matter ultimately to be decided through the public inquiry procedure. We had that assurance on the previous proposals for British Rail and the Parkway station further east in Kent, and I look to the present Minister to give us that assurance again.

As regards the Stratford or north Thames alternatives, I have already said that a terminal at Stratford could bring benefits because of the eastwards growth of London and the fact that the centre of London is moving in that direction.

No other scheme has focused on the national issues. Speeches today from hon. Members representing constituencies in the north have concentrated on passenger traffic. The Stratford alternative—Ove Arup's alternative, in particular—will also deal with freight.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich said in his introduction that none of us can be satisfied with British Rail's approach to the freight market. It is missing an enormous opportunity here. British industry, and especially the CBI, are extremely worried about that approach, and anyone who is concerned about the environment and the pressure on our roads should also be worried. Surely the main reason for the channel link was to enable British industry and people to flow through to the continental system. British Rail's proposals would tie us, from the beginning, to the same problem that Brunel battled with—the problem of gauges in Britain being different from those in other parts of Europe. I do not mean the gauge of the track, but the loading gauge and the size of truck and carriage that will be able to run on the British system.

As this stage, with all the effort being put into 1992, we should ensure that Britain's infrastructure and railways are compatible with the entire continental system and not merely the European Community. Opportunities are opening up throughout Europe, and eastern European countries now have the chance to link in. Lord Young said, off the cuff, that he foresaw Europeans travelling by train in the next century rather than by plane, but that will not happen unless our links can be as effective as those in Europe.

To deal with the proper concerns voiced so eloquently by hon. Members representing northern constituencies, the Stratford alternative only makes sense if we also have a cross-London rail link so that Stratford is one of a number of possible boarding and alighting points within the capital. As does the freight system, Ove Arup's alternative provides us with the opportunity progressively to upgrade the rail network north and west of London to handle the continental loading gauge. The swap-body system, in which the body of a freight wagon is moved on and off a lorry allows for huge growth. It occurs all over Europe and cuts transport time and costs. It is recommended by the European Commission, which emphasised its view that the system should be extended to Scotland, but that will not happen unless British Rail produces a scheme which can automatically cope with that system everywhere. Ove Arup's scheme is a start, and if we do not do something similar we shall be at a disadvantage when competing in Europe.

In contrast, what have we got? British Rail has ordered new rolling stock on the existing British gauge and has apparently ruled out upgrading lines designated for freight however far into the future one looks. British Rail has tunnel vision. It must look further ahead and must not merely upgrade within the existing British loading gauge, but upgrade to take continental wagons. Otherwise, we shall again be at a considerable disadvantage.

Some people may argue that these proposals are visionary, but there is a necessity for some vision in such a matter. We have the opportunity for the regeneration of Liverpool as a port. Ships could call there once more and load freight on to a European network at Europe's most westerly point. Freight could run straight through from Liverpool into Europe.

Other hon. Members have compared the situation here with that in France, which is way ahead in developing its passenger network and in planning for freight. The French scheme makes rail travel fit in strategically. One will be able to board fast passenger trains at Charles de Gaulle airport and people who do not want to pass through Paris will not need to do so. We should offer similar opportunities here.

One of the reasons why infrastructure in France, both road and rail, is generally more advanced than in Britain is that compensation arrangements there have been so much better. Our arrangements put a block on development. People feel aggrieved from the beginning when they know that compulsory purchase is to take place against their will and that they will get the lowest possible market value. In France, people are over-compensated by up to 25 per cent. That is surely a good incentive and it can be a saving. So often in Britain the fight against compulsory purchase takes so long that by the time the infrastructure is built, having bought the land, all the costs have escalated hugely. Better compensation would be a sensible way around that.

We argued about compensation in the debates on the Channel Tunnel Act 1987. We did not win the argument, but since then the Government have produced a discussion document on compensation and I encourage hon. Members involved in this issue to keep up the pressure for such a change. There should be improved compensation not just for farmers but also for householders, and for anyone who is bought out as a result of a scheme, whichever scheme is chosen.

Another factor in compulsory purchase orders for land is that if private sector partners are now to be brought in —and I welcome that—to infrastructure projects such as the channel tunnel link, they will want to make a profit out of the land that they purchase. The land is not purely pro bono publico but is required to be profitable for private sector organisations who enter the scheme. It is therefore equitable that the original purchase should not be at a knock-down price. The person who is forced to sell should get some benefit as the scene is changing. That adds force to my argument for the need for better compensation.

I support the motion, which asks the House to urge British Rail properly to evaluate the sensible north Thames alternatives. If British Rail does not do so, our debates on the high-speed rail link will continue to be dogged by complaints from many hon. Members, and from large numbers of people all over Britain, who are not satisfied that this huge national and international project has been approached from the beginning with the proper strategic issues in mind.

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): I congratulate the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on his excellent speech. I also congratulate the Minister for Public Transport on his appointment to his new post. I hope that he will pay careful heed to everything that the hon. Member for Dulwich has said. The hon. Member for Dulwich dealt very well with the point that I intend to make—that it is not a question of London and the south-east versus Wales, the north and Scotland, but a question of whether we are to have a national strategy in the national interest or whether there is to be anarchy, chaos and shambles.

We have heard about business men and women in Stuttgart, Milan and Lille, and where they will be. I am glad that they are not in the Strangers Gallery listening to the debate. It is a national scandal that we should be deciding national strategic issues on this basis. My hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said that he hoped that the Minister would pay heed to the facts, but none of us is very clear about the facts. The intention seems to have been to obscure the facts. Banks, property developers, British Rail and Members of Parliament with constituency interests have been fighting like rats in a sack while the national interest wanders lonely and afraid with no one to look after it. The Minister must take the national interest under his wing and look after it—otherwise, not only London and the south will suffer but also the north, Wales and Scotland.

Those who live in south-east London have no interest in seeing the failure of the manufacturing base of this country, nor are we interested in the ruination of the beautiful environment of Kent, the garden of south-east London. We want a sensible strategy to be developed. The Government must therefore take a grip on the problem. Discussion of the terminal issue has been no more than a parliamentary pin-the-tail-on-the-donkey exercise. We have to do better than that.

One of the most disturbing aspects of the shambles over the channel tunnel rail link is the Government's failure to take any responsibility for this major strategic transport decision. I well remember that in another debate the Minister's predecessor, the hon. Member for Enfield (Mr. Portillo), sat there with a studied, neutral expression on his face. He listened to one side; he listened to the other; then he got up and said, "Of course, it's nothing to do with me." That is not good enough.

The Government must take a view on a decision that will have important consequences for the development of the British economy and our place in Europe both now and into the next century. However, instead of recognising the importance of the rail link, the Government act as though it were of no more importance than a minor extension of the Central line to West Ruislip. The Secretary of State for Transport said that the plan for the route was a private matter for British Rail and its partners. That is no way to treat the issue.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Dulwich on tabling his motion. His constituency borders mine. The motion reflects the anger and despair of hon. Members on both sides of the House and in all parts of the country at the way in which the dispute is being handled. It is not yet too late. The debate has provided us with an opportunity to demand that the Government wake up to their responsibilities and look again at where the rail link is to go.

The Secretary of State and the Minister must also recognise that British Rail's plans will cause devastation in south London. There is no strong evidence that they will be of economic benefit to the region or that they will equip us with the means to face the challenge of integrating the British transport system with the European transport system. I am glad that hon. Members have not erred on the side of castigating British Rail and saying that it is all BR's fault. It is not without fault, but the villains of the piece are the Government who set us all off on the wrong footing.

Section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act, which prevents any public investment in the scheme, has forced BR to try to find the cheapest route possible under the shortest-term objectives. That is the reason for the mess that we are in. We can get out of it only if the Government's central role in developing the rail link is accepted. British Rail has still to announce its final plan, but it has announced loads of "final" plans. It is difficult to remember the number of "final" plans over the past two years. I wonder whether we shall still be waiting in 1992 for the "final" plan to emerge out of the shambolic Opposed Private Bill Committee procedure.

The last British Rail plan was a route through south-east London, which would have involved a massive junction at Warwick gardens in Southwark and the rest of the link in a tunnel under the Thames to King's Cross. That scheme had to be abandoned on 3 November 1989 because the costs were unacceptable to BR's partner, Eurorail. We have since been promised many times a formal announcement of the route, but we are still waiting. I fear that British Rail may now be forced, because of financial pressures, to rever to part of the route that it proposed in March 1988. That would be totally unacceptable to my constituents because it would mean that substantial parts of the rail link would run overground through Peckham, chopping communities in half.

The Government are spending money on inner-city projects, but they can forget inner-city regeneration if, sliced through the middle of Southwark there is a rail link which will divide the shops from where people live and cause a construction blight over the whole of this fragile inner-city area. All the North Peckham task forces and business men's breakfasts in the world will mean nothing. The area will be blighted and become dreadful if British Rail goes ahead with the March 1988 plan of slicing through the middle of Walworth and constructing what has been described as the Walworth wall.

Mr. Simon Hughes: The hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), the hon. Lady and I have similar views. We have never argued that there should be any environmentally unacceptable plan for the shire counties or other parts of Britain. Does the hon. Lady agree, however, that running rail services overground in what is already an environmentally harmed and polluted area would be just another form of discrimination for the haves against the have-nots? The Government must not try to divide parts of Britain against other parts. We will not, and the country should not, allow inner-city areas to be environmentally damaged any more than they are already.

Ms. Harman: The hon. Gentleman is correct.

The commercial pressures imposed on British Rail have led it into misrepresenting the devastation that would result from its cheapest option. British Rail implied that there would be a minor bit of returfing in Warwick gardens and that it would all be all right, resulting in only minor disruption. The equipment that British Rail admits will be used to carry out that work includes two bulldozers, two or three excavators, two bored pile rigs or two diaphragm wall excavators, one concrete-batching plant, two or three front and back-end loaders, one bentonite slump production plant, one large soil compactor, one reinforcing bar bending shed, four mobile cranes, four dumper trucks and numerous site huts—all on Warwick gardens, one of the few patches of green in an area that is struggling to regenerate itself. Warwick gardens would, in effect, be turned into a giant construction slum for up to 10 years. That would be the effect of trying to do the job on a cheapskate basis.

It is not in the national interest to strangle the manufacturing base of the north-west, north-east and Wales. It is not in the national interest to let our inner-city areas degenerate and turn into slums. The hon. Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) mentioned compensation. I have taken up many hardship cases. British Rail's criteria have been utterly inadequate. Many people want to sell their homes but cannot either because they are just outside the compulsory purchase zone or because they cannot prove severe hardship. They have been left completely stranded because the "compulsory purchase zone" description is completely inadequate. The blight has spread far wider than the compulsory purchase zone and people have been unable to take up new jobs or to move for family reasons. They have seen the value of their homes collapse. They cannot sell their homes—they are stuck.

The difficulties of my constituents have been made much worse by the continuing uncertainty surrounding the route of the link. No doubt businesses in the north and east feel that uncertainty and cannot look forward to developing for 1992 because they do not know how they will knit in with Europe, but people in my constituency feel that they cannot plan from one day to the next because we do not know what is happening. One of the commonest complaints that I receive is that people do not know where they stand because the route has not yet been decided.

British Rail has purchased 117 homes in the Warwick gardens area, but I am concerned because it is not maintaining them adequately. The homes have been purchased under the compulsory purchase scheme, but British Rail is not ensuring that they are used. Whole streets around the Warwick gardens area in my constituency have been bought up by British Rail only to be left to fall into disrepair. The properties are empty. Given the housing shortage in London, I hope that British Rail will ensure that those properties are filled straight away with, for example, the teachers that we need in our primary schools, or with social workers or nurses. The properties that have been purchased in this awful situation should at least be used to house what are described as key workers. I understand that British Rail has already spent more than £12 million buying those properties.

British Rail has made things worse. It has managed to unite opposing interests against it. Because British Rail is frightened of the public view, it has tried to ride roughshod over it. I invited British Rail to come with me to the meeting of the Lettsom estate tenants association. Those tenants will be affected by the rail link—The letter I received from British Rail stated:

"Thank you for your letter of 9 May.

Experience has told us that large public meetings are not effective in dealing with the perfectly genuine worries of people on the route of the Channel Tunnel Rail Link.

In the circumstances, I am sure you will appreciate why we shall not be sending a representative to the meeting at the Lettsom Estate Tenants' Association".

British Rail has given up coming to meetings because it does not have any answers. Whenever it has attended a meeting, people have been left more angry, more bewildered and more uncertain than when they arrived.

I want to examine the way in which British Rail has handled the private Bill procedure relating to the terminal. With the terminal at King's Cross and the channel tunnel ending at the coast in Kent, my constituency is clearly in the middle. If one takes a map and puts a dot on King's Cross and another dot at the mouth of the channel tunnel, one can see that there is a real question mark over whether the route will come through my constituency.

Of course, my constituents have an interest in the route of the tunnel. That is why I petitioned the Committee that studied the King's Cross Railways Bill and said that, through my representations, my constituents, wanted to be heard and to know the location of the terminal because it will affect them. However, I was told "No, you cannot speak to the Committee about your constituents' concerns. You have no locus standi. This Bill deals only with the terminal. You can talk to us about the route." But we all know what will happen when we get to the route. British Rail will say, "The terminal is already fixed. Thanks for coming to the Opposed Private Bill Committee, but we are sorry, our hands are tied. Look where the terminal is and look where the channel tunnel mouth is—you just happen to be in the middle. Sorry, you are too late. The terminal is there and the numbers are settled." By opposing my locus standi, it is British Rail, not the Court of Referees, that must take responsibility.

Of course, although British Rail is one of the key players, it is not here. These discussions always take place without the right information and without the right people being involved. However, I advise British Rail that when the Bill has been considered by this House, it will go to the Lords where there will be an Opposed Private Bill Committee and where I shall petition on behalf of my constituents. I hope that British Rail will see the error of its ways and allow my petitioners a voice in the Opposed Private Bill Committee in the Lords, despite the fact that BR outrageously blocked that voice here in the Commons.

The Government must establish a proper committee of inquiry to look at all the alternative routes to the rail link so that even those who may lose out in the end feel that consideration has been fair and in the national interest rather than a shambolic back-of-an-envelope job. The Minister will recognise from this debate that although people have held different and even opposing views about whether the terminal should be at Stratford or King's Cross, we are all united in our unhappiness about the handling of the matter. We are fed up.

There is no alternative to the Government repealing section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1988. We cannot continue with the present mess and uncertainty. The Government must face up to their responsibilities now and act to prevent the current shambles from worsening. I know from my past dealings with the Minister on health matters that he does not lack the intelligence to deal with the issue. He will quickly understand what is going on. I hope that, as a new Minister, he will have a new opportunity to understand the issues and that he will be a new broom. We should all welcome that.

The Government will not sort out the problem by blaming British Rail or by trying to persuade more of their friends in the private sector to come up with the cash. The Government can do so only by meeting the two demands that I and many other hon. Members are making today, which are that they set up a proper committee of inquiry to consider the best route and that they allow public investment in the project in the national interest.

I will support the motion for Stratford, but until the Government take those two steps, the present crisis will continue and my constituents and others throughout the country will continue to suffer.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) will take as read the polite remarks that I would make if there were more time, but many hon. Members wish to speak.

Commuter traffic on British Rail has dipped to a level which, if it were to persist, would make the additional capacity of a high-speed rail link unnecessary. We must remember in this numbers game that we cannot necessarily assume that the growth in use of Network SouthEast will continue; working at home, network working and all sorts of other developments may well diminish that use.

This is a particularly useful debate for clearing up some misapprehensions and I hope to do so. It is disappointing that many hon. Members who have spoken are backward looking. They have fallen into the same trap as British Rail in assuming that the world will stay much the same as it is now. Nobody could assume from listening to our debate that we are talking about a development which will not come on stream until virtually the next century. I shall make my remarks in that context.

The high-speed rail link is not indispensable to get passengers or freight from the channel tunnel portal to other destinations in the United Kingdom. We know that British Rail is spending more than £1 billion to bring international passengers from Cheriton to Waterloo in 1993. We are told that it can cope as it is until the year 2000. British Rail's joint venture partners, Trafalgar House, tells us that there are no plans beyond the year 2000. We also know that British Rail is developing plans to take freight round London on underused passenger lines either via Maidstone or Tonbridge-Redhill. With its sights set at a maximum of 6·1 million tonnes, it reckons that it can cope with that for the foreseeable future.

The high-speed rail link is not indispensable to the channel tunnel. On Thursday, Alastair Morton came to the Select Committee on Transport and said that his scheme was not dependent on the rail link. He said that Eurotunnel would make more money from carrying freight on lorries through the tunnel by shuttle, than on through-trains.

British Rail's proposed high-speed rail link is not a freight line. There are still those in the north of the United Kingdom who believe that King's Cross is vital to ensure that their goods reach mainland Europe quicker than they do now. Those who believe that are completely confused, because King's Cross has nothing to do with freight.

What is the British Rail-Trafalgar House proposal, and why should it not be accepted as it stands? My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne), who has had to leave, is asking a great deal of those of us who have dealt with British Rail during the past few yers to believe that it is so expert that it should not be questioned nearly as much as some of us try to question it. He made an impassioned plea for its expertise. Having watched it flounder its way through the negotiations and turn, in the end, with great reluctance to its private enterprise partner, not merely to carry out the contract it wanted, but to tell it how to design the line, I am entitled to feel some scepticism about British Rail's specialist expertise.

We do not know what the British Rail-Trafalgar House proposal actually is. We have been assured that a twin-track line following the M20 from an international station in Ashford to an international station somewhere near Swanley will stick pretty closely to the maps already published. After Swanley, it will follow a line that has not yet been disclosed, until it reaches a newly developed interchange at King's Cross. We could make some pretty good guesses about where it would go, but it would be silly to try to second guess British Rail at present.

I found it a bit thick for my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South to contend that it is impossible to evaluate any alternative because it is necessary to know in detail where a line will go in order to evaluate it. None of us has the faintest idea where British Rail's line is to go.

Mr. Spearing: Does the information that the hon. Gentleman has, and which I have not seen, state whether that link from the Swanley area to the King's Cross area will be entirely a new route in tunnel, an enlargement of existing routes or a mixture of both?

Mr. Rowe: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman anything other than some informed guesses to which I have been made privy that suggest that it will be a combination of both, and is likely to go underground for the last five or six miles, perhaps further.

We know that Trafalgar House and British Rail cannot build their line without subsidies, despite the fact that Trafalgar House defeated its five competitors for the contract partly on the basis that it would build it without a subsidy. That is the sort of constantly shifting sand with which the previous Minister and my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport, whom I am delighted to see here today, have had to grapple. Every time they think they have got something firm, it slips away from them.

I understand that the funding gap is closer to £1 billion than the £400 million suggested in The Times, but, again, we have no knowledge of the figures because such things are confidential. That is despite the fact that the arbiter, the sole proponent of this great scheme, is a nationalised industry. I find it difficult to see why information held by a nationalised industry should not more easily be put into the public domain.

I understand that British Rail would prefer to receive a lump sum for any subsidies it needs. Therefore, any deal based on commuters paying to use the line, either directly or indirectly, through Network SouthEast, would not meet that requirement. One is bound to ask in this year of hard Treasury decisions whether British Rail's proposed high-speed rail link is the most worthy recipient of £1 billion, even if that proved to be all that was required.

One cannot rely on British Rail. Let me give just one example out of dozens. King's Cross station has additional parking capacity of 150 places. Mr. Welsby who is now chief executive of British Rail—his handling of the project in its early stages was so exemplary that he was promoted—made me look extremely foolish in front of about 350 angry constituents at a public meeting by telling me that it was stupid of me to imagine that people would want to bring their cars to the railway station, as people who wanted to travel by train would travel by train. So it came as something of a surprise when his successor in charge of the transport project came to see me the other day, and when I asked why British Rail wanted Swanley, he said, as if I were a complete moron, "Because international passengers travelling to a railway station come by car." So British Rail cannot be trusted, and the entire process stands as a monument to its incompetence.

The costs of the proposal are dubious, even within the parameters of British Rail and Trafalgar House, but those parameters are drawn far too narrowly. I received from the managing director of Trafalgar House a categorical assurance that British Rail will make no contribution whatsoever to the infrastructure costs of a parkway station at its preferred site near Aylesford on the edge of my constituency, yet the costs of the necessary roads to that green field site will be enormous. If Eurorail were a grocery company, it would be required to contribute, with obvious consequences for its costings. Is not it similarly appropriate to include in those costings the costs of upgrading the passenger lines that British Rail propose should be used for freight, including the sound insulations that the many thousands of people who live along those routes have good reason to expect? I believe that the true costs of the British Rail proposal are substantially in excess of £3 billion.

Finally, Kent county council is increasingly unhappy about the proposal. No sooner had Mr. Welsby been translated to his new post as chief executive than he confirmed that Swanley is now indispensable to the project. Kent county council views that change with great alarm. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich said in his most eloquent speech, it affects the green belt. The proposal is also an enormous threat to the prosperity of Ashford. For many years Kent has tried to make Ashford the development centre for the county. A major interchange at Swanley and a Maidstone parkway station would make it almost inconceivable that Ashford would grow in competition with those two centres. It is significant that the consultants who have been appointed to carry out the work on Ashford international station have so far received no further instructions.

I might say in passing that British Rail's own study for Maidstone parkway station shows that more than half its likely passengers would come from the Sittingbourne, Swale and Gillingham areas. No one who has seen the A229 over Bluebell hill in the morning can seriously believe that the Maidstone parkway site is a sensible place for a parkway station, even if it did not drive a coach and horses through Maidstone borough council's and Kent county council's green belt policy. The county council has understandable anxiety that a careful count of houses has shown that more than 7,000 houses in Kent alone will be affected by the three routes in British Rail's present proposals, so for all those reasons we have to be extremely careful.

What about some of the other possibilities? I shall speak of one only, the Bechtel—Manufacturers Hanover Trust proposal, which addresses many of the questions that I have raised. The whole of its proposal is in the public domain, but for the reason that I mentioned to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South it is not in detail.

One of the few skilful things that British Rail has done in all the negotiations is successfully to destroy the Government's original intention to get it to work with a private contractor. British Rail did that by shutting out design considerations from the private contractors who were invited by British Rail merely to contract to do the work that British Rail had already specified. I understood that the whole idea of bringing in the private sector was to bring its greater imagination and experience to bear on the design. It was only when British Rail got nearer to London than Swanley that it allowed Trafalgar House to take part in the design.

The Bechtel—Manufacturers Hanover Trust proposal will not be a pig in a poke, and it is important for the Minister to remember that. That company has a record of properly pricing its products and if the price is accepted it completes them at that price or carries the overspend. I am worried that we have a budding Concorde on our hands and that once British Rail has the Government behind it on the project we shall find, amazingly, the cost constantly escalating. There may be other desirable elements in the Bechtel plan. For example, it proposes to continue its line to St. Pancras and that would be a great help to the east midlands. There is also a far greater chance of Bechtel finishing the project without Government subsidy.

In all the debates about the channel links, freight has dominated, especially for those who live in the north or west. The northern fear is that if the continental UIC gauge, which is indispensable for a 21st century freight system in this country, is taken to Temple Mills it will cripple the north. I do not think that that is the case.

British Rail is developing ingenious small-wheeled bogies that will allow UIC gauge containers to travel on United Kingdom lines. The problem, as British Rail admits, is that the number of such wagons would be very small as a percentage of all European wagons. Are we seriously to believe that European manufactures will hang about waiting for a small-wheeled bogie to turn up when they have a container to put on the railway? Of course not. They will put their containers on the nearest available wagons.

I understand that the French are already building a transfer depot which will allow such containers on large-wheeled bogies to be transferred to lorries in France. I remind the House that Eurotunnel will make more money taking lorries on shuttles than it will make on through trains. As a result the roads of Kent, indeed the roads of the United Kingdom, will be filled with all the lorries that the channel tunnel was supposed to take off our roads. However, if the small wheeled bogies were based at Temple Mills they would form a high percentage of the total United Kingdom wagons and the rest of the United Kingdom could be more easily served by UIC gauge containers.

It is extraordinary for British Rail to take such a pessimistic view of freight. Its estimates of what it can capture are lower than those of SNCF, lower than Eurotunnel's and lower than the estimates of the independent consultants who have considered the matter. At 6·1 million tonnes, the estimate is such a small proportion of the United Kingdom's total freight that the anxieties of the rest of the United Kingdom about being linked to the system are barely worth the trouble. Is British Rail right to be pessimistic? I emphatically believe that it is not. Let us look at two measures. International freight growth has been running at 12 or 13 per cent. on the railways in recent years and that growth will accelerate in 1992. Unitised freight movements in 1989 exceeded the forecast that had originaly been made for 1993.

Next we must look at pollution. For how long will the heavy goods vehicle continue to enjoy its privileged position? I remind the House that we are looking into the 21st century. In the light of the announcement yesterday of the new anti-pollution agreement into which the Department of the Environment has entered, we can confidently forecast that pressure will mount every year to get the freight off the roads and on to rail. The tragedy is that, under British Rail's proposals, there will be no international rail network of any sensible proportions to take freight. Any proposal that puts forward a purpose-built freight line, as does the Bechtell-Manufacturers Hanover Trust proposal, on UIC gauge deserves much more analysis than it has so far received.

British Rail is pessimistic because, at the very beginning, when, no doubt, Mr. Welsby was in charge, it took the view that freight would be on a small scale, so it entered an agreement with SNCF, with a tariff that it now discovers gives it no profit. Trafalgar House has admitted that it see no profit in freight.

Mr. Wolfson: My hon. Friend has made my point. Unfortunately, Trafalgar House appears to be taking the same view. That is both depressing and wrong.

Mr. Rowe: As I understand it, the reason is that it has gone along with the traditional railway freight allocation income of so many pence a mile. That puts the United Kingdom at a huge disadvantage. People who enter such contracts at the beginning of a project of this size should be sacked.

The cost to the infrastructure of the Bechtel-Manufacturers Hanover Trust line are much lower than the costs of the British Rail-Trafalgar House proposal and deserve serious consideration. For example the new Isle of Grain container port, the proposed MCA development at Rainham and the contribution that it will make to the lower Thames road crossing make it clear that the opportunity for getting input into the costs of building the line and the stations attached to it are greater than under the British Rail plan. When I tell the House that only eight houses in Kent will be affected by the Bechtel-Manufacturers Hanover Trust line, whereas 7,500 houses are affected by British Rail's proposals, it will understand that it would be irresponsible for a Kent Member of Parliament not to press for the line to be looked at.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) is right. The centre of London is moving east. In 15 years' time it will be nonsense for my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) to pretend that King's Cross, that Victorian station, is in the centre of London. It will be on the periphery by then. Most international business travellers will want to come to docklands and to the City, so the eastern approach will be much better.

For all these reasons, I urge my hon. Friend the Minister not to rush into accepting a proposal that will cost more than we are told that it will cost, will be less effective than we are led to believe, takes no account of the future European freight and is in many ways wholly wrong.

1.8 pm

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): I agree with some of the comments made by the hon. Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), but one narrow point will illustrate our difference in perspective. He said that London is moving eastward, either in the next 15 years or well into the next century. He should understand that one of the pressures that those in the north feel strongly is that much of the emphasis on the tunnel and developments from it means that we shall be at a considerable disadvantage in the early years. Pressures for economic and industrial development will be dictated by the physical and geographical realities of where the tunnel is and where adequate links to it have been established.

[Mr. Tony Lloyd]

From the point of view of the north, decisions must be made quickly to implement proposals. We cannot afford to have our links built at some indefinite time in the future. I hope that that message is understood, because there is common agreement among hon. Members that planning by the Government and British Rail has been appalling. Solutions have been based on the minimum possible cost and effort—not strategically or to achieve the maximum possible benefit for the nation.

The hon. Member for Mid-Kent mentioned freight. The debate on King's Cross has nothing to do with freight, but I am unhappy and unclear about whether the solutions being advanced by British Rail take account of a region such as mine—a major trading region second only to the south-east in economic importance. We insist on adequate access to the channel tunnel for freight distribution. There are all manner of things that we feel British Rail has not provided, such as a decent high-speed link with the north-west, but I accept that those issues are not relevant to the debate.

Whether the terminal is at King's Cross or Stratford we are still unhappy about the lack of through trains. People travelling to the continent from Manchester, Liverpool or any of the northern cities will not want to stop in London. That is no disrespect to Londoners—we simply do not want to have to change in London to travel through the tunnel and we feel that British Rail is letting us down.

There should be adequate links with the three railway lines to the north—the west coast, east coast and midlands lines. As my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) said, the Nottingham line is not electrified. That is ridiculous. It is equally ridiculous that, the line from Blackpool to Manchester is not electrified, allowing the north-west to become part of an adequate, modern railway system. Any link must connect the London interchange with those three rail lines. A good interchange system is a high priority.

I say to hon. Members who are arguing the case for Stratford that the problem in the north is that we know that at King's Cross there will be at least a semi-adequate system. It is incumbent on those hon. Members to guarantee that the interchange at Stratford will be just as good. That case has not been made to me or to others from the region.

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I am grateful to my hon. Friend for giving way and I am sorry to interrupt his flow. As a London Member, I support Stratford because I believe that it will do less damage to the King's Cross area and because in terms of transport infrastructure it makes much sense. We do not see Stratford as a means of worsening rail services or through trains for people from the north. It would improve the throughput of rail freight and passengers and enable people such as my hon. Friend to travel directly from Manchester to the continent more simply than if the trains went from King's Cross.

Mr. Lloyd: My hon. Friend's remarks are central to the case being put forward by those who are arguing for Stratford.

The other problem with the Stratford development is the possibility of delays being built into the system, which would put the north at a further disadvantage. It must be demonstrated that any movement away from King's Cross would not disadvantage the north. Whatever is on offer, we must have an assurance that it will not disadvantage the north. We cannot afford delays in an operational system for the northern regions.

If there is to be any reconsideration of the proposal, it is paramount that we are guaranteed that the funding will not sabotage achieving what we need. Central to the case of hon. Members so far has been cost minimisation rather than quality of service maximisation. We know the position with the King's Cross development—we understand the advantages and the disadvantages. If that proposal is to be changed, it is incumbent upon the Minister to guarantee that the system will come into operation quickly and that it will be properly funded so that it is a genuine national system, not just a system to serve the interests of one region.

1.16 pm

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on obtaining such an important debate at such an opportune time. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on his appointment. In view of the importance of the issue that we are discussing, he will be kept busy for many months and years ahead.

It might be helpful to consider the background to the debate—not only the rail link, but the channel tunnel itself, without which we would not be having this debate. The channel tunnel has become an extremely expensive project, not only in money but, as we sadly heard the other day, in loss of life. The House is concerned about the considerable loss of life during construction work to date.

The main aspect of concern today is the immense financial cost of the project, which has now risen to an estimated £8 billion. The only people who have been right about the finances of the channel tunnel are its critics. Those who have advocated the project have consistently got their figures wrong. The changes in figures have all been negative when proven. The only positive changes to the figures are the hypothetical estimates of the revenue to be earned from passengers and freight. Those figures are pure guesswork because no one knows to what extent freight lorries or passengers and their cars will transfer from the ferries to the channel tunnel. Therefore, it is true to say that the jury is still out. Indeed, the bankers are potentially out of pocket with the channel tunnel finances. The £6 billion debt for the channel tunnel project means an annual interest bill, at current rates, of £900 million. Administration costs will add another £200 million, producing total annual running costs of £1,100 million annually. The revenue earned from the existing ferries operation is estimated at £500 million, so even if the whole of that trade transfers to the tunnel, there would remain a deficit of £600 million and a loss-making channel tunnel for ever and a day. Against that background, we are asked to contemplate an immensely expensive rail link.

The passenger volumes on which the channel tunnel revenue forecast was based were made at a time when it was thought that the tunnel trains would travel faster than is likely as a result of the technological requirements of the latest designs. That and other factors mean that passengers will probably have to pay more to use the tunnel, as will those who use it to transport freight. Therefore, the traffic volumes predicted in previous revenue forecasts are even more suspect.

The new ferries being introduced on cross-channel routes are larger, safer and more comfortable than ever before—they even include club class. They present a competitive advantage by comparison with the tunnel. The ferries will offer much more comfort than cramped railway carriages or the shuttles that will force passengers to remain in their cars as they travel through the tunnel. Those advantages, combined with new technology such as hovercraft catamarans on some of the long-haul channel routes, will mean that passengers will enjoy more comfort if they continue to use sea crossings rather than the tunnel.

With so many doubts about the tunnel's financial viability, one must question also whether the proposed rail link makes sense or whether alternatives should be examined. Several of my hon. Friends have effectively advocated the viability, in terms both of financial considerations, passenger comfort and commonsense, of alternative rail links. The use of Stratford would seem to make sense and be more cost-effective, and it could benefit many more people. British Rail's plan seems ill thought out, and it has brought complaints from right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House and from their constituents.

The motives of the supporters of, and participants in, the proposed link were questioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich. My hon. Friends and I would not question motivations of profit, because they are laudable in any business man—but we do question the profit motive when it is at the expense of a taxpayers' subsidy, and it is being suggested that the rail link cannot work, in terms of a terminal at King's Cross, unless such a subsidy is provided. That would be ludicrous, and we must not be left with a developer-led scheme that results in a taxpayers' subsidy.

If there is any spare money around from property developers, it should be used to realise the potential that exists at, for example, Stratford. The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) was right to appeal for Stratford to be developed, reminding the House that his constituency is not the most beautiful area in London. It is incumbent upon us to promote a project that might improve his constituency.

The alternatives are not adequately examined in the current proposals. Perhaps if we consider the alternatives in detail we may find that they could benefit many more constituencies and many more people.

In Dover, we are interested in a good rail link. The present link is a disgrace. Last Friday night when my wife came down to the constituency, she missed an urgent appointment that she was supposed to attend with me, because the train journey ended up taking three hours instead of one and a half. It should not even be one and a half hours. If we had a decent rail service, we could get the time down to an hour and it would then be equivalent to services in the rest of the country.

What is British Rail going to do about improving the Dover service? It does not have to wait for the channel tunnel rail link. Something could, and should, be done now.

Dover is a part of east Kent and we are therefore anxious that, if the rail link is constructed, Ashford international should be promoted as a major through-change. That would bring prosperity to east Kent and it would reduce the level of unemployment, which has gone down considerably due to recent Government proposals and the changes that have taken place in this country in the past few years, but it could still be reduced further. A development at Ashford would be beneficial to that.

In Dover our other interest is to ensure the survival of the ferry industry. Ferries now offer a better, safer and more comfortable service than they did. That is why I am particularly disturbed to hear Labour spokesmen talking about the repeal of section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987. The Government put that section into the Act to support the ferries of Dover. It was a sensible section, which ensured that the ferry companies and their employees could be confident that the industry could compete fairly with the tunnel, which would not have a competitive advantage over ferries from Dover. Section 42 ensures that the Government do not put money into the tunnel to do down the ferries in Dover. Therefore it is wrong for the Labour spokesmen to seek to do down the ferry industry. We must ensure that Labour's proposal to repeal section 42 does not succeed and that it is not supported by the House.

Should there be any public subsidy or support for British Rail? I question whether that would be sensible. I cannot see why British Rail or the proposed Eurorail company should have a subsidy. It would enable a thoroughly unpopular route—one which would not exist if it were not for the subsidy—to be viable. It is a route that does not seem to have any significant benefits. Some environmental benefits have been promised for some constituencies, but they would make the situation worse in other constituencies, such as Dulwich and Mid-Kent. I do not see why £300 million to £400 million of public money should be put in to do down those constituencies for the benefit of a few areas on the route.

The speed of travel is a marginal reason for a public sector subsidy. It is debatable whether the tunnel, when it is completed, will reduce considerably the time taken to get to Paris. The tunnel will not improve travel speed as much as was originally thought because the rolling stock will have to go at a slower speed, and consequently it will not have such a time advantage. To promote the project with public money to achieve a marginal time benefit seems ludicrous.

What would happen if the project exceeded its budget? Once the first £400 million or, as my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) said, £1 billion, has been committed, what will happen if the project goes wrong? Will the Government be committed to financing a share of the overrun, or most or all of it? That would be a major mistake. What would happen if the channel tunnel rail link project went into receivership or liquidation? If the Government had committed money to it, would they have to bail out the project, either in its entirety or in part?

[Mr. David Shaw]

The Government must consider the alternative uses to which £100 million, £200 million or even £1 billion of public money could be put. Airports in other parts of the country or road links would be immensely beneficial and would be of far greater benefit than the narrow use of £1 billion on the channel tunnel rail link.

I am critical of the fact that no figures relating to the cost of the proposal have been published. Only rumours and leaks abound about them. There has been no public debate about the cost of the channel tunnel rail link. There have been suggestions in the press today of a £400 million subsidy, but it could amount to £1 billion or more. There is not even a back-of-an-envelope calculation to support the proposal.

I see no reason to worry about what the French may or may not be doing. Two out of three people who cross the channel go to France. The French are the net beneficiaries, since only one out of three people who cross the channel from Europe are French. We should not therefore subsidise a project that would benefit French holiday-makers and the French rail link.

The project is imperfect. The proposal has been neither properly considered nor properly debated. Its finances are uncertain and the taxpayer would have to pick up a considerable part of the bill. We should keep the taxpayer out of it. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich on his motion. I shall vote for it.

1.32 pm

Ms. Joan Ruddock (Lewisham, Deptford): I join other hon. Members in welcoming the Minister for Public Transport to his new post. We look forward to his contribution to the debate.

It is extraordinary that we should be debating what is arguably the most significant engineering project of our time, with potentially the most profound impact on our nation's economy, on a private Member's motion in a half-empty House. Why has that happened? It is because the Government have adopted an entirely cavalier approach. They have chosen to ignore the nation's economic needs and the railway revolution across the channel. They have chosen to stand aloof while alarm and despondency have spread through public and private institutions alike.

It is extraordinary that the Government have not once raised the subject for debate in this Parliament—extraordinary, yes, but surprising, no. The Government's doctrinaire approach to planning, the economy and transport prohibits strategic planning and proper consideration of the public interest. The hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) is to be congratulated on bringing this subject before the House, although I guess that it will become obvious that he does not have the backing of his Government.

The hon. Gentleman's motion seeks to place the responsibility on British Rail for assessing the alternative rail links to the channel tunnel. We cannot support him. There is a clear need to examine the alternatives. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) has consistently called for a full public inquiry into the project, though we recognise that the time for such an inquiry has probably passed. We recognise also that British Rail cannot be expected to be objective. We propose instead that the Secretary of State, by means of the good offices of his hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport, should establish a committee of experts to examine all the available alternative rail link options. We believe that the committee could report within three months and should have a brief to examine the economic and environmental effects, the costs and the safety aspects of all the proposed routes. We suggest that can be done because so much work has already been done outside Government circles. The experts should hear the representations of the many groups of ordinary people who have real concerns and sensible questions and have proposals to make on this subject.

A wide consensus exists on the criteria that should determine the preferred route for the channel tunnel link. That consensus reaches across the political spectrum and encompasses the Confederation of British Industry and the Trades Union Congress. Last month's public opinion panel survey of Members of Parliament gives further testimony to that consensus. It found that the order of priority to specify considerations for determining the route was as follows: first, the need for through links to United Kingdom regions; secondly, the need for fast links to London; thirdly, the environmental impact of the route; fourthly, the cost of the route; and, last, the scheme's ability to be financed completely from private capital. Clearly, the Government are out of step with the views of hon. Members. The survey found also that two thirds of the Members questioned were not satisfied that the regions would be adequately served by links through the tunnel to Europe. Significantly, the survey recorded strong support for greater investment in the railway network to maximise the economic benefits of the channel tunnel.

This debate, because of the motion, has understandably focused on the merits and, to some extent, demerits of Stratford as a second international terminal. Undoubtedly, there are significant planning issues and property interests associated with all potential terminal locations, but we believe that achieving the priority objectives of the link should determine terminal location and not the other way around.

There is a clear consensus about objectives but little confidence that the Government are ensuring that British Rail and Eurotunnel meet them. Instead, a financial straitjacket has been applied by a Government determined to maintain the farce that this massive project can be built without any public money. The outcome is likely to be another botched job and a further public outcry when the latest BR-preferred route sees the light of day. The Secretary of State, we understand, has been studying the plans for six weeks. Perhaps the Minister will tell us today when the right hon. Gentleman is likely to make an announcement, or is it possible that he is having second thoughts?

British Rail's briefing for today gives some sign of the impossible hoops through which it has to jump. It is clear that the financial regime of the Secretary of State cannot be made to work. The preferred route, we are told, will include a proposed new commuter service from Kent to King's Cross in an attempt to attract public subsidy. What a ludicrous way to devise a national infrastructure plan for the 21st century. Having thought up this addition to the route, British Rail then uses it in its critique of alternative routes, saying that the latter do not offer the potential for a Kent commuter service. I do not think that we will find that many Members actively support a preferred route on the grounds of an enhanced commuter service for Kent.

There are certain fundamental questions. How can we provide a high-speed rail link, a service which links the whole of the United Kingdom to the tunnel and offers a first-rate service for passengers and freight alike? We believe that ideally we should look for a dedicated track built to European standards. Anything less will create a differential between the British service and the continental service, such that in parts of Britain trains could be running at half the speed that they run in France. Will the Minister tell us today whether his Department really finds that acceptable? We believe that the needs of the north of England and of Scottish passenger services——

Mr. Jacques Arnold rose——

Ms. Ruddock: Just a moment.

Those needs require major interchange facilities at King's Cross. That is the official Labour party view. However, we believe equally that the case is well made on environmental and strategic grounds in London and Kent for an alternative route linked to Stratford. The case for the Arup group proposal has been rehearsed today. There are those who believe that those two requirements can be combined with a relatively fast link from Stratford to King's Cross at a cost of about £500 million.

The House needs to know whether that can be done. Is it a solution to what could otherwise be presented as conflicting interests? Does the Minister agree with the costing? Has he or his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State studied the proposal? Are they still prepared to consider it, and if not, why not?

Mr. Jacques Arnold rose——

Ms. Ruddock: I am sorry, I shall not give way; I have been asked to be brief.

Will the Minister confirm that such a combination of terminals present no disadvantage to the running of through services to the north?

As an hon. Member representing a south London constituency, I am acutely aware of the need to avoid a route that goes through such a densely populated area as my constituency. However, as a shadow Minister, I am also aware of the strong feelings of those in the midlands, the north of England and Scotland that they could be sold short if the concerns of only Kent and London were to be taken into account. Opposition Members are extremely anxious to find a consensus and solution that is right for Britain as a whole.

Our economic future depends on the rail links to the tunnel. With desperately overcrowded roads in London and the south-east and the dilapidated state of public transport, we shall have a disaster on our hands if millions of people and tonnes of freight are simply dumped outside the tunnel or in the heart of this capital city. We must plan for the needs of the nation as a whole with economic efficiency and environmental sensitivity at the top of the agenda.

We are aware that European money is available for European projects. Why should not Britain be the beneficiary? If the French can produce a nationwide network of super-fast trains, why cannot Britain? If the French railways can carry 42 per cent. of all long-distance freight, why cannot British Rail do the same? Why should British Rail be forced, through financial restraints, to behave as though it was still running a 19th century railway instead of planning for the 21st century?

The Secretary of State cannot be allowed to stand aside any longer. He must consider repealing section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987. I heard what the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) said. Of course, we supported that section to protect the ferry services running from our coasts—and rightly so, but it is our contention that those services are competitive and that they remain so without that special protection. It is in the nationwide interest that they do so. However, we should also bear in mind the nationwide interest of being able to provide an adequate railway link to the channel tunnel.

The Secretary of State must relax the financial regime imposed on the rail project. Although we believe that money is required, we are completely opposed to using taxpayers' money to prop up private sector projects. The Minister must be aware that rumours abound. It is high time that his right hon. Friend came to the House and admitted what is going on. Will the Minister tell us today whether we can expect a statement on the financing of the rail link before the spring recess? Before he does so, perhaps the Secretary of State should also consult his officials about the likely impact of the proposed European directive on establishing a Community railway policy, because the harmonisation required to build a Community network is directly at odds with the expected British Rail-Eurorail proposals for the British channel tunnel rail link. The report on that proposed directive states:

> "From a technical point of view it is obviously possible, to a certain extent, to live with different systems and different specifications. However, this approach, which up to now has been the basis of co-operation between the different networks, will result in high costs and less reliable equipment. The European railways should rather adopt 'universal' specifications compatible with the particular set of international routes they plan to serve, which is their only chance of success."

We must note what the directive says about developments on the continent. The Secretary of State would be ill-advised to ignore them.

If the Government continue with their present stance, Britain will again be relegated to the dark ages while continental Europe reaps the greatest economic benefits of the single market and the opening of the tunnel. We are in danger of paying the highest environmental cost for the least economic return. We in the Labour party are clear where the blame for this fiasco lies. We share all the anxieties that people have about the behaviour of British Rail, but responsibility for the fiasco lies with the Government, and it is the Government who must act now. Money can and must be found to make an adequate link. A review by a committee of experts will not delay the proceedings. We know that it is crucial if we are to achieve the high-quality, high-speed rail links for the whole of Britain, to which the Labour party is committed.

1.47 pm

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman): This has been an interesting debate and it is certainly not yet over. It has been particularly valuable to me as a new Minister at the Department to listen to this timely and useful discussion. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) on his courtesy to me prior to the debate and on the clear and even-handed way in which he presented his case. I also thank him and the hon. Member for Lewisham, Deptford (Ms. Ruddock) for their kind remarks in welcoming me to my new position.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) described the debate as being, in effect, a five-hour tutorial for a new Minister, and he is right in so far as 15 hon. Members have spoken, excluding my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich, and the debate has certainly been helpful to me. I hope that I bring a fresh and inquiring mind to the issue. It will also be helpful to British Rail and to officials at my Department, and I will ensure that the record is fully studied. To the extent that I cannot answer the questions raised in the time available to me, I will write to hon. Members who have contributed to the debate. I find these half-day debates helpful—for a Minister, one's desk is cleared and one rightly has to listen to the arguments and so far as possible reach decisions. The proceedings which follow such debates are also most helpful.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich will be glad to know that no one, least of all British Rail, disagrees with the terms of his motion. British Rail has examined the alternative routes, including those to Stratford, and will continue to examine them. It has been in contact with both promoters of the alternative routes to Stratford or to the east of London to discuss the details of the schemes. I understand that the new Chairman of British Rail, Mr. Bob Reid, plans to see the two groups himself—the Ove Arup group and the Manufacturers Hanover Trust and Bechtel group. I hope that my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich will be reassured by that.

Both British Rail and the Government are quite clear that before adopting any final proposals, and before submitting them to Parliament, British Rail will need to be as satisfied as it possibly can be that it has made the right route decision. Parliament will expect to be satisfied, and to have it demonstrated, that the alternatives have been properly and fully examined and that there are good and convincing reasons for the final proposal. There is no monopoly of wisdom in these matters and all ideas must be looked at on their merits.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe), who sought to put this debate in the context of the channel tunnel opening in three years' time and a rail link being a decade away, even with the fastest possible agreement on the route, and its design and structure. The opening of the channel tunnel and the rail link are governed by two different time scales.

I can give not only my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich, but other hon. Members, the assurance that British Rail takes the alternatives seriously—it has to. I shall return to the suggestion of the hon. Member for Deptford for a committee of experts. British Rail has to convince not only itself but the Department of Transport and Parliament because the private Bill procedure, which operates for extensions or alterations to the railway network, provides a careful examination of such proposals.

The issue of the channel tunnel rail link must be seen in the context of the Government's policy that the maximum benefits and efficiencies from transport systems, as in other walks of life, are achieved where there is fair and equal opportunity for as many competitors as possible to compete in the market. As for inter-city rail and international services, we believe that the railways can and should compete on an equal basis with other transport modes including sea, air or road. I chose my words carefully when I spoke of "inter-city rail" and "international services".

Operators and users of other services are not subsidised and in terms of economics and fairness there is no reason why international rail services should be subsidised. The essentially commercial nature of international rail services is also enshrined in section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act 1987. The hon. Member for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) referred to the channel tunnel. If he believes that the Government are going to bail out or subsidise the channel tunnel, I can disabuse him of that fact. He may have been confusing the channel tunnel and rail link. I assure him that there is no question of the Government bailing out the construction of the tunnel, which needs additional finance. We shall see whether the company is successful—it has a good story to tell and I hope that it will soon be successful.

Section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act was widely supported at the time, not least by the Opposition, who now seem to be calling for its repeal. Indeed, the hon. Member for Deptford called for it to be repealed. At the time, there was widespread recognition that it was right to guarantee fair play to the ferries and ports, and to those working in those organisations who were concerned that subsidised international rail services would inevitably, in effect, subsidise the channel tunnel. I can tell my hon. Friend the Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) that we have no intention of repealing section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act, which relates to the international travel aspects. There are other aspects of the financing of any rail link which section 42 does not directly affect.

British Rail has had a clear remit, both from the Government and from Parliament, to look at the channel tunnel rail link as a commercial project, and one that will have to be acceptable to Parliament.

Earlier, the hon. Member for Newham, South implied that the Government and British Rail were on a hook because of prejudice, that they did not intend to provide finance for the channel tunnel rail link and had a preference—almost a craving—for private sector capital involvement. The hon. Gentleman was wrong on both counts. He knows that the massive sums involved in providing finance for any channel tunnel rail link—albeit sums which are presently under consideration by a joint venture—require the Goverment's approval and agreement because they are taxpayers' funds. It is not true that the Government are not involved in providing finance for capital investment in a nationalised industry. I assume that the hon. Gentleman was referring to the degree of Government subsidy and the hon. Member for Deptford, is now suggesting that we should ditch section 42 of the Channel Tunnel Act, but I have said that the Goverment are not contemplating that.

There is no blind prejudice in favour of private capital. If private capital has a role to play, that is fine, but the hon. Gentleman recognises, as I do, that private capital has a much higher implicit cost in terms of the return that it has to earn. That means that the involvement of private capital tends to make a project even more difficult to justify. The private sector can contribute to property development, which nationalised industries are not particularly good at, nor is it their job, and to the management of particular projects. There is certainly no prejudice on my part or on the part of the Government.

Mr. Spearing: Surely the Minister is saying that by virtue of the need for a public organisation to achieve a return of 8 per cent. or for private capital to have an even higher return there is a hurdle that the Government have to jump or a hook on which they have to impale themselves? Will he confirm that if he applied the criteria which applied to the Victoria line when it was built under the authority of Ernest Marples, those considerations would not apply?

Mr. Freeman: The hon. Gentleman is right in his analysis. I have no idea what rates of return private sector capital requires in this or other projects. We set an 8 per cent. real rate of return for commercial projects for nationalised industries. I recognise that the involvement of private sector capital can make the attainment of that more difficult in some cases. As I have said, however, private sector capital can make other contributions. The 8 per cent. real rate of return changes with current financial circumstances and the advice and views of the Treasury. I do not know what rate applied when the Victoria line was built.

The hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) asked the Government, and me specifically, to be the guardian of the national interest. I cannot shuffle off that responsibility because the Department of Transport's job is to approve investment proposals put to us by British Rail. Any channel tunnel rail link is likely to involve substantial sums of public sector capital and must therefore involve our careful consideration of the alternatives and our being persuaded that the chosen route is the right one.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) rightly drew attention to the importance of the environmental impact of any route—the King's Cross route or the Stratford route to east London. British Rail and Eurorail are undertaking a full environmental impact assessment for the rail link along the lines of the European directive. Any proposal which comes to us for final consideration will have to go through that process.

The Government cannot accept the view that major infrastructure projects do not go hand in hand with a sensible commercial approach. After all, the channel tunnel is a commercial project and is much the better for it. The project has captured public interest in a powerful way, and in concept and scale is the leading transport project for the United Kingdom and France, if not the world. Even so, it needs to be kept in perspective. It will not be the only link with the continent. For years we have had ferries, hovercraft, hydrofoils and aircraft linking and integrating Britain with Europe, and those alternatives will certainly continue. The tunnel will be a substantial and important addition to the existing links. Above all, it will be a tremendous competitive spur.

With regard to freight, the House should bear in mind that the capacity of the tunnel will be sufficient to handle only 6 per cent. by volume of total United Kingdom trade in 1993, including oil. In 1988, Liverpool handled 7 per cent. by volume of total United Kingdom trade, Southampton 11 per cent. and Tees and Hartlepool 13 per cent.

I am aware that Eurotunnel would like us to look at an analysis of dry bulk unitised trade between the United Kingdom and Europe. The tunnel's share of that United Kingdom trade would be between 14 and 20 per cent. I hope that that puts the tunnel into perspective in relation to some of our other great ports. If the tunnel were opened today it would rank as the 12th or 13th largest port in the United Kingdom in terms of volume of freight handled.

Probably the most important aspect of the tunnel is its role in joining the United Kingdom's rail network to the mainland of Europe. That will enable British Rail for the first time to compete with the airlines on price, speed and comfort. No one doubts that international rail travel has a bright commercial future. British Rail is already in the process of investing on a commercial basis more than £1 billion to provide comprehensive passenger and freight services on the day the Channel tunnel opens in 1993. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent for reminding us that we should not lose sight of plans which are already in place and those that we hope to see in place to ensure that we have the rail network to service the tunnel when it opens.

By any standards, this is a massive investment programme and it is fully geared to maximising for the railways the tremendous opportunities offered by the tunnel. Last December, with the approval of the Government, British Rail signed a contract worth some £350 million with SNCF for the purchase of 18 high-speed trains. The trains will be operated by British Rail and will run between London and Paris and London and Brussels.

Today I can announce that the Government have approved British Rail plans to build an international passenger terminal at Waterloo station and a maintenance depot in west London. The hon. Member for Vauxhall (Miss Hoey) cannot be present in the Chamber. I hope that Lambeth council will adopt an objective and fair approach to the planning applications for Waterloo station because that service has to be open and running in three years when the tunnel opens. If the hon. Member for Vauxhall were here I do not think that she would be able to defend further the argument that we should close down our plans for Waterloo and move to Stratford. The time scales for the two projects are wholly different.

The investments on the passenger side are worth about £175 million. I can also announce that we have just approved investment of about £80 million on electric freight locomotives and on electrification of the line between Tonbridge and Redhill. That forms part of British Rail's core investments of a further £175 million in channel tunnel freight. The Government have now approved the great majority of British Rail's investment plans for 1993.

Mr. Prescott: The new investment that the Minister has announced will be welcomed by the House, especially the investment in freight trains. Europe wants to see the harmonisation of our high-speed rail system so that trains can leave the tunnel and travel on the French and Belgian systems. Will the new freight trains be able to do that?

Mr. Freeman: I am sorry that I cannot answer the hon. Gentleman's question because I have not briefed myself on the matter. I will write to the hon. Gentleman. I understand the significance of his question.

My hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) asked us to take a longer term-view—what he called freight vision. While I am sure that he will welcome the announcements that I have made today about improving the existing freight system through new equipment and electrification, he rightly asks us to look 20 or 30 years ahead. No large business undertaking can react short-term to pressures in the next two or three years. British Rail has to take a serious, studied, careful look at the development of freight traffic, and I hope that it will take an optimistic and forward-looking view about the share of such traffic that it can gain. I should not support a limited vision on that. In any proposals which come before me, I shall want to look carefully at whether British Rail has looked forward a decade or two, and I hope that it will rise to the challenges.

Beyond 1993, traffic will undoubtely grow. No one seriously argues with British Rail's view that, sooner or later, extra capacity will be needed between London and the tunnel. There also seems to be general agreement that a new line is the best means of providing that capacity. Against this background, British Rail published its preferred route in March 1989. As the House knows, the cost of environmental improvements to British Rail's proposed new line—in particular, the cost of tunnelling under London—affected the viability of the new rail link proposal.

Latterly, British Rail has been pursuing with Eurorail —the Trafalgar-House-BICC consortium—the possibility of establishing a joint venture company whereby the private sector would play a major role in both the financing and the commercial operation of British Rail's internationai rail services, including the construction and operation of a new channel rail link. British Rail and Eurorail have now submitted to the Government certain proposals for carrying forward the joint venture and the Government will be responding to a complicated package of suggested amendments as soon as we are able.

The hon. Member for Deptford asked me whether we would make a statement before Whitsun. I cannot commit my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport or the Government, but I can tell her that this debate is both helpful and timely. We shall try to reach a decision as quickly as possible because I am aware, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich and the hon. Member for Peckham pointed out, that there is concern about blight on the routes proposed. We know British Rail's preferred route, but the need to remove uncertainty as quickly as possible is very much at the forefront of my mind.

Mr. Prescott: I am extremely grateful to the Minister for giving way to me again because I know that he is pressed for time. In whatever option is put to them is the Government's preference still for the tunnelling rather than the surface option?

Mr. Freeman: I cannot comment on that because we have to evaluate the revised proposals put to us. We have not reached a conclusion and I shall not speculate as to what combination of tunnelling and above-ground track we are likely to favour. The Government are aware of the Eurorail and the Ove Arup outline proposals and the support that some hon. Members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich, have lent to these alternative approaches. The Stratford routes have attracted support for a number of reasons. Some wish to see an international station at Stratford because of the local advantages that this would bring. Others have outlined what they see as the national advantages of such a scheme, including car parking and the onward movement of traffic, both freight and passenger, to the north and the west. I have listened to those arguments with great care.

A Stratford terminal was on the British Rail shortlist as a possible site and has therefore been carefully evaluated by British Rail. Had British Rail chosen Stratford as its preferred location for the second terminal in London, it would still have approached it from the south, the route from Kent, and not from the east through Essex as envisaged by the promoters of the alternative schemes. The reason for that is to ensure that any benefits of constructing a new line are shared with Waterloo and that it is linked with the increased capacity that would come with the construction of such a line. That would not necessarily happen if at a relatively early stage the line went north and across south-east Essex.

Mr. Rowe: This is of considerable importance because that was the original point that BR made to us many times. It later changed its mind and explicitly said that it did not envisage that being an essential part of the criticism of the other routes into London. Several Conservative Members were present at the meeting when that was said.

Mr. Freeman: I have approached the debate with some caution as I am new to the job and do not want to put my foot in it. I hope that I am not making dogmatic statements. I shall study exactly what was said. I apologise if I have confused or confounded my hon. Friend.

I say to hon. Members who represent constituencies to the north of London, particularly my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, south (Sir P. Blaker), the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes), my right hon. Friend the Member for Selby (Mr. Alison) and others, that of course we understand the significance of a rail link for the regions to the north and west of London. It is most important that we take a national view of any proposals put to us. Although it is fair to say that the bulk of passengers who will use the rail link will live in the home counties, greater London and the south-east, I accept the argument that one must consider carefully the implications for the north-west and north-east. I have listened carefully to the case for what are seen as the short-term advantages of using King's Cross, but I do not propose to dwell on the relative advantages and disadvantages of the various routes.

As I have made clear, the Goverment and BR accept entirely that it is BR's responsibility to convince the country that it has examined all the alternatives and reached the right decision. However, there are certain aspects of the alternative proposals to which I should perhaps refer as it may help to clarify the issue for those concerned about it. The first point relates to comparative costs. Everyone must exercise much caution when making comparisons. Those who believe that the costs of the alternatives are higher then the costs of BR's route say, with some logic, that the alternative routes involve building a four-track railway to handle passengers and freight, whereas BR's route is for a two-track passenger railway only.

I will reply in writing to hon. Members whom I have not answered specifically. The hon. Member for Deptford asked for a committee of experts. British Rail is responsible for putting forward a preferred route and the Department of Transport and Parliament are responsible for evaluating it.

The contribution that I can make in the forthcoming weeks and months is to listen, as I have to this debate, and to visit the proposed sites. I look forward to visiting Waterloo, King's Cross and Stratford. I will ensure that BR and the Government explain and clarify any proposals extremely carefully, including alternative costs. To the best of my ability, I will ensure that a decision is taken expeditiously to avoid blight and doubt.

Ms. Harman rose——

Mr. Freeman: I am sorry, but I have run out of time.

Several hon. Members have said that that blight and uncertainty have affected their constituencies. I look forward to further debates and discussions on this important subject.

2.13 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): I welcome the Minister to his new job and also his first announcement that the chairman of British Rail will meet those proposing the alternative routes. I hope that he will meet them with an open mind, and I congratulate the Minister on moving so quickly to do something so constructive. If he is successful in getting BR to consider the alternatives, the name of Freeman may rank with Brunel in the annals of British railways.

I had hoped to move the second motion on the Order Paper about the need for a democratic revolution in the United Kingdom. However, this debate has proved a classic case study of the need for many changes in the way in which we make our decisions and in the democratic processes in this country. One of the most important historic decisions that this nation could face—how we link with our continental partners—has been typified by bodge, cock-up and half-baked proposals. There has not been a serious, democratic, planned effort through the House, through another place—which should be in a far more representative form—through the contributions of elected regional assemblies or through a system in which everyone could make a decision through a freedom of information Act——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I know that the hon. Gentleman has been in the Chamber all morning, but I must remind him that he is speaking to the first motion, which is about the channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Allen: That is why I am now speaking on behalf of my constituency and all those in the east midlands who have profound anxieties—which I hope the Minister will take on board—not merely about the current proposal, but about the alternatives.

I have some sympathy with the Stratford proposal because it appears to make geographic and railway sense in a way that the current proposal does not. My concern, which applies to both schemes, is that the east midlands, and Nottingham in particular, could be isolated. That certainly would be the case if the midlands main line was not electrified. There has been electrification on the continent, railway building in France, the building of two new north-south lines in Germany and Spain is changing its gauge. They are all gearing up for 1992 and a single market.

Those whom I represent, and those in my region generally, are fearful that we shall be left behind, with the line going up either the east coast or the west coast. One of the major engines of the British economy—the east midlands—will be left to flounder and to fend for itself in a competitive new area—[Interruption.] It appears that other hon. Members are still waiting to contribute to the debate.

The responsibility is not merely to my constituency, my region, south London or the constituencies of other hon. Members who have spoken this morning; it is to the whole nation. How can we all benefit from the opportunities that the channel tunnel and the rail links can offer? While supporting Stratford, we must make it clear that Stratford itself is no better an alternative than King's Cross on its own. The essential feature is that Stratford must be linked to King's Cross-St. Pancras. Without that essential link, there will be great concern among hon. Members, constituencies and regions about the efficacy of the proposal, just as there are doubts about the current proposal.

My great fear, which has not been allayed this morning, is that the proposers of the new scheme may well follow the salami tactics to which the hon. Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden) referred in another context. They may go for the easier part of the scheme, which would be the channel tunnel link to Stratford, and then, all of a sudden, say that for commercial reasons they cannot afford the expensive, updated, dedicated link from Stratford to King's Cross-St. Pancras. People in my region would be left high and dry with connections possible from Stratford up the east coast and even across to the west coast. That would be a devastating blow.

Will the Minister take away one thought? Why cannot there be two stations serving London? There could be a Stratford station, which would be London international east, and a King's Cross-St. Pancras station, which would be London international north, with the lines going through of equal status so that through traffic could go to all parts of the region.

We have heard some knocking of British Rail, and it was partly deserved. However, we must direct our criticism not at the current Minister but at some of his predecessors over the past decade, who inhibited British Rail from presenting reasonable options and plans. In imposing investment restraints, the Government left British Rail in an extremely difficult position, and that has led to botched plans that will serve the interests neither of the nation nor of my region.

I welcome alternative proposals that have appeared, and am glad that the representations made by trans-Pennine, Midland Mainline Consortium, the Railway Development Society and many others throughout the land are apparently being echoed in some of the Minister's remarks.

I began my speech by remarking that there may be hallowed future references to the name of Freeman along with that of Brunel. I was only half-joking. We have a new Minister and a new British Rail chairman, and there is a possibility that progress will be made. Certainly there is a feeling among the public that the matter should be re-examined and a new settlement reached, so that we may have a railway system of which we can all be proud, and which taps into the continent in the same way that our foreign competitors have done.

I wish the Minister well in his new job. His is nothing less than an historic role, and I hope that he will seize the opportunities before him.

2.21 pm

Mr. Norman Miscampbell (Blackpool, North): I welcome the opportunity presented by the motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), for right hon. and hon. Members representing constituencies in the north of England to air some of the concerns that we have about a project which pre-eminently seems to affect the south-east. In reality, it will affect us all.

Anxieties have already been expressed by my right hon. Friend the Member for Blackpool, South (Sir P. Blaker), and by the right hon. Member for Halton (Mr. Oakes) and the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) that the link should benefit the north just as much as anywhere else. I also appreciate the arguments made by right hon. and hon. Members representing constituencies in southern England. After all, if such a link were to be routed through my constituency, I would have the same passionate and vehement interest in obtaining detailed information about the villages affected. Inevitably, those of us representing northern constituencies can deal with the matter only with a very large brush.

Those who look after our interests include the Channel Tunnel Group, which comprises the most powerful and influential bodies in the north-west. They include north-west local authorities; Rail Forum; Greater Manchester Economic Development Limited; Central Manchester, Merseyside and Trafford Park development corporations; English Estates; chambers of commerce in the north-west of England, and the Confederation of British Industry in the north-west. Those voices wanting to be heard in the debate are not insignificant—and it is not an insignificant issue.

Time is of the essence, and there are also questions of convenience and money. They can all be summed up in one plea that the north-west makes—"Please, the time has now come to stick to the present proposals for King's Cross." I know perfectly well how time will be consumed if we change our minds again—I am not a member of the Court of Referees for nothing. I give my hon. Friend the Minister an assurance that the Court of Referees will deal with subsequent matters, a new Bill, or new proposals—if it has to do so—rather more expeditiously than he fears. However, he is right to say that it will take time.

If the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) were in her place I would say to her that if she comes before us next year for locus standi—I cannot anticipate events and I shall not comment on any decisions already made—we shall view with great sympathy those people who have problems because a line is being driven through their constituency. Nevertheless, time is of the essence and any change is likely to cause more delay.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): I have listened to my hon. and learned Friend with great interest and, speaking from the perspective of my Leicestershire constituency, it seems that far too much consideration is being given to landscaping and the link going round villages in Kent. Those resources should be devoted to better terminals in the midlands and in the north for the tunnel rail link. That is of great concern to my constituents.

Mr. Miscampbell: I do not altogether agree with my hon. Friend. We live in a lovely island and we have managed to make a good mess of it in some areas. I am in favour of ensuring that we do not make any more mess. I am an old inflationist—there is no question about that. I think that a few extra millions to ensure that we preserve Kent looking nice and reasonable will be money well spent and that people who follow us will be pleased that we had the courage and the guts to do it.

Obviously arguments are raging in Kent, in the constituencies that the line might pass through, and all those arguments will be opened up again. Time will tell. If that happens we may find that we are being left behind. We have manufacturing interests, not only in the north-west, but throughout northern England and they must be accommodated. If they are not, those regions will be marginalised. I cannot go into detail because there is not time, but on behalf of hon. Members representing northern constituencies I want to voice our constant concern that we should be looked after and our interests should be borne in mind, because they are also the interests of Great Britain.

Convenience is another issue. It is no use saying to my constituents or to people in Liverpool or Manchester that there will be a train going down to Stratford. Traditionally, they have gone to Euston or, if they come from the north-east, to King's Cross and they will still have to use those stations under these proposals. It became clear, although we did not go into details in the Court of Referees, that the complex of Euston, which is adjacent to King's Cross, has the capacity for such things as travelators, and the easy communications between the two stations mean that it is simple to change from one to the other.

In reality the vast King's Cross development, and Euston, which is nearby, means that we are discussing two stations which can easily be joined. Therefore, for convenience, and because the stations are connected with Heathrow and with 60 per cent. of the underground lines, we should stick with King's Cross.

British Rail included in the King's Cross Railways Bill in November 1989 powers to improve the Hampstead link. That would be another link with the general rail network.

Naturally, people in Kent who have problems because of the link are intensely interested, but in the north we have our interests. We want people to pay more attention to them. For example, as several hon. Members have mentioned, there is the electrification of the rail lines in the north of England. We want to know of British Rail's plans for electrification between Manchester and my constituency. What are its plans for a depot in the north and where does it propose to site it? How will it be tied in to the lines coming through from King's Cross—we hope—or from wherever, to join up with continental railways? Such a development is essential and we must have it.

We do not want to be marginalised and left on the periphery. However, many people in the north of England believe that that is what will happen. I refer not just to Conservative party members but to Labour party members. Many ordinary folk in the north of England believe that London thinks that it knows best, but——

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Secondary Education (Maidstone)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

2.30 pm

Miss Ann Widdecombe (Maidstone): I am grateful for the opportunity to raise such an important subject. When the proposed reorganisation of schools in Kent, particularly in Maidstone, comes before the Minister, my constituents will wish certain criteria to be paramount. They are the maintenance of grammar school places and the size of the schools concerned.

Another matter must also be closely examined. I raise it with specific reference to Kent and Maidstone, but it could affect other authorities that my find themselves in the same position. It relates to the financial mechanism that authorities have to use when they engage in a large-scale reorganisation.

Kent county council decided this week not to go ahead with the proposed closure of Oakwood grammar school or with the reorganisation of other schools in Maidstone until the autumn, when it is to institute a proper review. It will be the third review of Maidstone's secondary education in three years. Two years ago, there was a proposal to close Senacre, Maplesden Noakes and Astor of Hever schools in my constituency. There was a great deal of uncertainty which did them no good. While they were under threat, parents were reluctant to make them their first choice and to send their children to those schools. The threat was removed in the face of an immense outcry by the people of Maidstone who did not want those high schools to be closed.

One of the reasons given for the proposed closures was that school rolls in the area were falling. To some of us that seemed peculiar, in view of the immense amount of development in the south-east—the growth of housing estates and the pressure on the area that is concomitant with the building of the channel tunnel and the rail link. It was difficult to understand how school rolls could be falling. We have been told that now there are more children in the primary schools and that in three or four years' time they will filter through into the secondary schools.

The recent closure proposals, which have not been abandoned but whose consideration has merely been deferred, have brought in their train, once again, uncertainty and blight. The proposals stem from the wholly admirable Kent county council decision to move from selection at 13 to selection at 11. Kent county council has a wide variety of schools—high schools, comprehensives and grammar schools, including those based on the 11-plus system, the 13-transfer system or the Thamesside system, the latter being the least satisfactory.

I am delighted that Kent county council has decided that, in due course, Maidstone will move to selection at 11. But what will happen to the grammar schools? If there is selection at 11, children of 11 and 12 will seek grammar school places. There are only two ways to cope with that extra demand: either the grammar schools must expand to absorb those children, or the authority must cut down on the number of forms of entry.

Many of my constituents and I have been alarmed by the fact that the Kent county council has proposed in recent months to close one of our four major grammar schools—Oakwood boys grammar. When the primary school population is rising and more children will need grammar school places and when, because of a complete change in the system, more grammar school places will be needed anyway, what is the sense in closing a grammar school? The consistent answer has been that the county council can see no sense in closing a grammar school, but it proposed to do so—and may yet propose to do so—because the financial regulations governing secondary education are such that the council does not feel able to keep the school open for three or four years if rolls are falling.

There are smaller schools than Oakwood grammar in the county. When I asked why, if Oakwood could not be kept open, smaller schools could be, I was assured that the only reason was that transfer at 11 was occurring more quickly in those areas and, therefore, the length of time a school would have to be financially unviable was much shorter. Kent county council expressed its problems in this way:

"Formula funding is based largely on the number of children attending a school. While older children, who pursue more intensive and extensive curriculums, attract more money any school must make sure it attracts sufficient numbers of pupils. If they fail to do this they will lose resources and, if they are unable to stem this flow, could 'wither on the vine'."

Kent county council said that it had a particular problem because of a temporary dip in numbers—that is, it is dealing not with a long-term trend but a short-term difficulty. Although the school roll may be due to pick up in, say, five years' time, because of the shortfall in pupils numbers in the interim, there is a shortfall in resources. Kent county council says categorically that, because of the rules governing formula funding, the local authority cannot top up school budgets to help schools through this problem. The authority has asked whether more flexible approaches to the proplem can be taken without abandoning the principle of formula funding. For example, could not a school that has no transport costs be credited with the opportunity costs of transport, so that that is taken in on the plus side of its revenue? Apparently, the formula funding problem is as bad whether it is a locally managed scheme or not.

Kent county council feels that if it is facing a massive reorganisation, it should be possible to treat the whole thing as one big in and out scheme so that, instead of having to hand back the proceeds to the Treasury when it disposes of buildings, it could say that that money is but a part of the cost of having to provide other buildings, and it could then be assessed only on the net proceeds. The county council has worked out that if it were allowed to do that, it would be able to produce a profit of £4 million in west Kent, which it could use for new buildings——

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Does my hon. Friend agree that if the county council's interpretation of the rigidity of the formulas is correct, there is a serious danger that a whole range of schools will opt for direct funding which, if it were to continue, would make running the local education authority very difficult?

Miss Widdecombe: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. He, too, is most concerned about this problem because his constituency covers part of Maidstone and these schools serve his constituents. He is right—Maplesden Noakes school has already applied to opt out, as has Cornwallis school. Those schools will be familiar to my hon. Friend.

Obviously, a pattern could be set but I do not believe that that pattern would be necessary if Kent county council could say finally and firmly, "This is what we want to do. These are the schools that will survive. We shall ensure that there is no reduction whatsoever in the number of grammar school places. We shall ensure that buildings are ready and in place when the changeover to 11 is made so that education does not suffer. This is the number of places that we have to provide for in high schools, and this is the number of high schools that we need."

If Kent could say that finally and firmly and could assure my constituents that there is no question that between now and the time when selection takes place it will indulge in endless reviews based on some immediate ad hoc assessments of where school rolls are falling and where they are not, my constituents could have the stability that they want. If the only way that schools can guarantee stability is to seek to opt out, there is obviously the possibility of increased numbers of applications to opt out. That in turn will make it difficult for the Kent county council to come up with a proper organisation.

Apart from the maintenance of grammar school places, my constituents are also concerned about the size of the schools involved. It was proposed that the Oakwood site would be closed, but that Oakwood school would be amalgamated with Invicta girls school to produce one large mixed grammar school. The proposed size of that school was 1,600 pupils. Surely this Government of all Governments have always believed that small schools have a value as long as they are viable, that individual attention for pupils is valuable and that large impersonal schools do not always best serve the community.

Two years ago, when the proposed high school reorganisation was under way, we were told that some of the schools would have 1,100 pupils, but now we are told that a grammar school of 1,600 pupils is proposed. That flies in the face of what I think both the Government and the county consider ideal. Indeed, the county has said that the ideal school size is 800 pupils. That makes one wonder why it has come up with a proposal for a school twice that size.

Apart from the closure of the grammar school and the fact that the new school would be on a different side of town, my constituents would be deeply unhappy if the number of smaller schools in the area were to decrease and they were left only with a choice of enormous schools where the head cannot possibly know every pupil, where there will be increased discipline problems—that must occur even in the grammar school system if the school is very large—and where the individual development of each child is much harder to maintain.

I should welcome the Minister's comments on what the Department regards as the right size of school at least in general, if not in this context. Does the Minister agree that the Kent county council, whose grammar schools have an excellent reputation, should not come up with a system which results in fewer grammar schools? Is there any possibility of treating the whole reorganisation as an in and out scheme and is there any way that formula funding could be made more flexible to help schools that face a temporary problem? Is it true, as Kent county council has said, that if it wants to keep a school open but there is a temporary problem, it is forbidden to top up? Is there something that Kent could be doing? If so, my constituents want to know about it, because they would demand that Kent does it.

There has been a massive public outcry against Kent's proposals, particularly this week when the decision was being taken. I can see exactly what will happen. These proposals will be dropped as the review of the high schools was dropped. We shall enter the next academic year with Oakwood thoroughly blighted because nobody will know whether it will survive in the long term. We shall face another period of gross uncertainty in which schools will be named as possibilities for closure. The process will have been going on for years. It must be stopped. Does the Minister agree that it is essential for the good health of education anywhere under whatever system that there should be stability and certainty? Does she further agree that even if that must be jeopardised once because of a major review, it should not be jeopardised four times in a short period?

2.45 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) on securing this Ajournment debate on the reorganisation of secondary schools in Maidstone and the wider area. I share her anxieties about stability, about which she spoke with such clarity and vigour and which she was right to highlight. I fully understand that the upheaval that has been going on in this part of Kent almost continuously in the past few years is not satisfactory for the stability of the schools or the education of children.

My hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) in an intervention noted the possibility of grant-maintained schools causing difficulties for the local education authority in its planning proposals. That may well be so, but grant-maintained schools may provide the stability that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone talked about. When considering the possibility of grant-maintained status the Government have always borne in mind the wishes and entitlement of parents to have a choice in education.

My hon. Friend drew attention to the public consultations on several options for the future organisation of schools in her area in general and Mid-Kent in particular. She mentioned that Maidstone grammar school and Maidstone grammar school for girls are unlikely to be changed. However, she said that it was intended to amalgamate Oakwood Park grammar school and Invicta grammar school for girls. I listened carefully to her comments about that and about the possibility of changing the age of entry from 13 to 11. I have noted her points about the uncertainty that that is causing and about the effects of school size and of choice of school for parents.

I shall concentrate first on the way in which the Government look at reorganisation. It is important to describe how proposals come to us for decision. Obviously, we have to look at the proposals sent to us by local authorities strictly on their merits. We take careful account of the circumstances and arguments put forward, both for and against. We listen to the consultations, but we cannot prejudge the issues.

Therefore, I am sure that my hon. Friend will accept that I cannot tell her precisely what our views might be on particular proposals and so it would be difficult for me to give her specific guidance or reassurance about the sizes of schools, the way in which they are organised and whether there is adequate choice in terms of single sex schools or grammar schools. All those issues must come through in the section 12 proposals.

Local education authorities should be looking carefully at their school organisations because the Government are committed to improving quality for education. That was part of the thrust of our Education Reform Act 1988. We are also committed to ensuring that there is better value for money in education and, with all the other demands we have, that we make the best use of the resources that we can afford for education.

We have repeatedly been asking local education authorities to remove surplus places in schools that have been created by falling rolls. When those places are removed it releases money for more productive use, for example in improving the learning environment through larger budgets for repairs and maintenance and for passing on, through local management, to schools.

It is important to say something about my hon. Friend's remarks on size and preference. We do not believe that there is any optimum size for secondary schools. Much depends on local circumstances. Small schools may need relatively more generous support to offset diseconomies of scale, and larger schools have their own challenges. Planning an appropriate school organisation for their areas is a matter for the local education authorities. If the local view is substantially that a school is of a certain size that view will come through clearly in the consultation exercise.

We have always made clear in our circular 3/78 and elsewhere, the importance we attach to giving full weight to parental preferences for particular sizes, types—including the option for either grammar schools or single sex schools. I am sorry that I am not able to give my hon. Friend more guidance on that, but I am sure that she will appreciate the difficulties that I would be in where I to commit myself too firmly at the Dispatch Box.

My hon. Friend mentioned capital receipts and capital in relation to local education authorities when they are making proposals that embrace a large number of schools. She referred, in passing, to what are known as in and out schemes, which allow local education authorities to utilise capital receipts from the sale of facilities for the provision of broadly similar facilities, without having to make the normal 50 per cent. reduction for debt redemption.

We believe that those schemes represent an excellent method of ensuring that resources are used to the maximum advantage. Therefore, it is for each local authority to decide, with its legal advisers and the auditors, where there are particular in and out transactions that come within the terms of the Local Authorities (Capital Finance) Regulations 1990. No approval or consent from the Department of the Environment is required. I think that my hon. Friend knows that, providing those conditions are met, it seems possible for that scheme to operate. I hope that she will welcome that message and take it back to her authority.

I was extremely interested in what my hon. Friend said about the application of local management schemes for schools in Kent. She said that it seems that Kent feels that there are no ways in which assistance can be given to small schools. That is not quite the case, because the Government have always recognised that there are extra costs associated with small schools. I talk not only of primary schools—three quarters of all schools in this country fall into that category—but of a number of secondary schools.

We have given the local education authority quite wide latitude over including factors in its local management of schools formulae to protect the curriculum in small schools. A number of local authorities have taken that up. Many factors to achieve that have been designed by local authorities, some of which could be contacted by Kent for assistance in designing those factors. For example, schools can be allocated lump sums, or there can be per capita enhancement for schools below a threshold size. So long as those factors do not amount to a falling rolls factor—in other words they do not interfere with the amount of money per pupil going into a school—the local authority can submit proposals to the Government and we shall be happy to consider them.

Kent's scheme provides some curriculum protection for primary and middle schools. But I understand that it provides no curriculum protection for secondary schools. That is a matter for the Kent education authority if it wishes to seek a variation in its scheme to lower that point, and we shall consider such an approach.

Mr. Rowe: If, for example, a school wishes to improve its heating system to make savings in future, can money be provided under that flexible arrangement? If such improvements involve running costs more than capital sums, would that be a possibility?

Mrs. Rumbold: There has been some misapprehension concerning Kent. I have spoken to other hon. Members representing Kent constituencies about small schools.

The question raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent must be considered as part of the total component factors for allocating resources. If an appreciable need is felt by the governing body of a small secondary school that the school should be classified and there should be some compensating factor, it can produce a proposal which we shall consider carefully. I know that that is not a direct answer to my hon. Friend's question, but it opens the door for the authority to approach us.

Obviously, it is right and proper that Kent should review its secondary school provision against that background. The authority is concerned to provide value for money. It is known to be a good authority which takes care to ensure that many of its resources go back to the schools, the children and those responsible for teaching them. Obviously, it is important for Kent to find a way to provide a school system that implements our education reforms and benefits children and parents in the area. But it is entirely for the authority to determine what is the most appropriate organisation to achieve those objectives. It cannot do that in a vacuum. We have made it quite clear that we attach great importance to public consultation and we also have to follow the statutory procedures laid down in sections 12 and 13 of the Education Act 1980. They require that if a local education authority wishes to establish, close or change the size or character of a school, it has to publish proposals explaining its intentions. Following publication there has to be a two-month period in which interested parties can submit objections.

If objections are made, if we give appropriate notice to the local education authority or if the school concerned is a voluntary school, the proposals fall to us to decide. Of course, we shall treat them strictly on their merits. However, through the forum of today's debate, I urge the authority to take great care in its consultations and proposals to take note of the widely held feelings that my hon. Friend the Member for Maidstone has outlined and the disruption that such proposals inevitably cause when parents feel insecure about the future of a school. I wish the authority well and I hope that the schools settle into a sensible plan of organisation.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Economic Development

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list by year for the last five years, the economic development that has been made available in South Yorkshire by (a) the EEC and (b) by central Government.

Mr. Norman Lamont: The question as drafted calls for a major exercise of economic impact assessment which could only be provided at disproportionate cost. The hon. Member may have a more specific query in mind, in which case he may wish to rephrase the question.

Privatisation

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list, in a manner consistent with the reply to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) of 31 March 1988, Official Report, columns 604-6, for each privatisation measure since 1987, the Government's merchant bank advisers, brokers, reporting accountants and solicitors and details of any advertising agency involved; and whether any form of competitive tendering was undertaken in each case.

Mr. Lilley: The Government's merchant bank advisers, brokers and solicitors in each privatisation 1987 are listed below. Reporting accountants and advertising agencies employed in the sales were usually joint appointments with the company, and are also listed. In addition, a number of sales of subsidiaries were carried out by nationalised industries. Details of the advisers for these sales are not held centrally.

In each of the privatisations the appointment of merchant bank advisers, brokers and advertising agencies was subject to competition.

The appointment of reporting accounts was subject to competition in all except two of the cases listed. In the case of Short Brothers the company's auditors were appointed without obtaining alternative tenders, to take advantage of their existing knowledge as this was expected to give rise to worthwhile savings in terms of time and costs. In the case of the Skills Training Agency, Deloitte, Haskins and Sells were appointed on a single tender basis, following the appointment of Deloitte Corporate Finance as merchant bank advisers. In each case a competitive rate was negotiated.

The appointment of solicitors was subject to competition in all cases except Rover, where Slaughter and May were appointed jointly with Barings Brothers.

Tax Share (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Flannery: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish the formula used to calculate Northern Ireland's attributed share of United Kingdom taxes.

Mr. Lilley: The ways in which certain taxes are collected means that, for Northern Ireland, a share of the revenue yield must be attributed by applying a set formula. These are set out in Statutory Instruments 1975/1313, 1977/1879, 1983/1599 and 1988/1667, made under section 15 of the Northern Ireland Constitution Act 1973.

Oil Taxation

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimates were used by the Inland Revenue in concluding in paragraph 9 of a press release of 20 March, entitled "Oil Taxation", that the longer-term revenue effects of the taxation charges discussed in the press release are expected to be broadly revenue-neutral overall.

Mr. Lilley: Costings of this sort, involving many projections well into the future, are inevitably extremely uncertain. Estimates of abandonment expenditure are based on surveys of industry intentions. The revenue effects of the measures referred to in this part of the press release also depend on a wide range of other assumptions, such as about oil prices and production levels and about other expenditure.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the longer-term annual revenue effects of the measures proposed in (a) clause 52 and clause 53, (b) clause 54, (c) clause 55 and clause 56, (d) clause 96 and (e) clause 97 of the Finance Bill.

Mr. Lilley: I have nothing to add to the aggregate estimates in the annex to chapter 4 of the Financial Statement and Budget Report 1990-91 and, as far as clauses 55 and 56 are concerned, in the 22 January 1990 Inland Revenue press release entitled, "North Sea Oil—Restriction of Capital Losses".

United States (Foreign Investment)

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest available figures for (1) annual and (2) total direct foreign investment in the United States by (a) Great Britain, (b) Japan, (c) the Netherlands, (d) West Germany and (e) France.

Mr. Norman Lamont [holding answer 1 May 1990]: Information is published by the Central Statistical Office on United Kingdom outward foreign direct investment by United Kingdom companies in the United States. Figures are also published by the United States Department of Commerce on inward foreign direct investment into the United States by a number of countries. Because of differences in coverage, country attribution, accounting practices and methods of compilation, figures for United Kingdom direct investment in the United States from these two sources will not correspond. The latest available information from both sources is as follows:

European Monetary Union

Mr. Shore: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, following the meeting of the 12 Finance Ministers in Galway on 31 March and 1 April, what proposals have been made for the timetable of introducing phase 2 and phase 3 of European monetary union.

Mr. Major [holding answer 3 May 1990]: No such proposals have been made. It was agreed at the special meeting of the European Council on 28 April that the preparations for an intergovernmental conference on economic and monetary union which will begin in December this year should be intensified with the objective of finishing the work of that conference in time to permit ratification of the results before the end of 1992. It is too early to say how feasible such a target will be.

THE ARTS

British Museum (Research)

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Minister for the Arts what responsibilities he has in respect of the level and type of academic research carried out by the British Museum (Natural History); and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Luce: The day-to-day running of the Natural History museum, and decisions on the museum's research programme, are matters for the director and trustees of the museum.

I understand, however, that the Natural History museum fully intends to continue to undertake a wide range of academic research work, but that it plans to concentrate research effort primarily into important scientific programmes relevant to contemporary needs and issues such as the environment and human health.

CIVIL SERVICE

Administration Trainees

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Minister for the Civil Service in 1989 what percentages of successful applicants for the Civil Service administration trainee direct entry scheme were (a) educated at Oxford and Cambridge, (b) arts graduates and (c) attended fee-paying schools.

Mr. Luce: Of the 65 candidates recommended for appointment as administration trainees/higher executive officers (development), 55 per cent. were educated at either Oxford or Cambridge and 56 per cent. were arts graduates. The identity of schools attended by candidates is not recorded for statistical or other purposes.

TRANSPORT

British Rail

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will obtain for his Departmental library a copy of the Consumers Association's report on British Rail services dated March 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: My right hon. Friend received a copy of the Consumers Association's report on 1 March. He will be meeting representatives of the Consumers Association on 24 May to discuss the article.

Driving Tests

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport which driving test centres had (a) the 10 highest percentage pass rates and (b) the 10 lowest percentage pass rates per annum for each of the last five years; and how many people these figures represent.

Mr. Atkins: It is not the Department's policy to publish comparative pass rates for test centres.

The average percentage pass rates for the Driving Standards Agency regions for the last five years for which figures are available were:

	1985	1986	1987	1987-88	1988-89

Noise Pollution

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will review procedures for dealing with complaints from those whose personal environment has been badly affected by noise from new motorways.

Mr. Atkins: I am satisfied with the procedures for dealing with complaints from those affected by noise from new motorways and that the Department handles these complaints sympathetically.

Motorways

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will outline his Department's policy on the provision of ribbed edgelines on motorways;

(2) what regional differences of policy exist in his Department on the provision of ribbed edgelines on motorways to reduce the number of accidents on motorway hard shoulders;

(3) what plans he has to introduce ribbed edgelines onto all motorways in the United Kingdom as standard carriageway markings.

Mr. Atkins: The Department has encouraged the use of ribbed edgemarkings on motorways since 1987 following experience earlier on. The extent of installation in each region is influenced by the need for replacement and maintenance of existing lining systems. We are shortly to offer advice to English regional offices which should encourage further installation of ribbed edgemarkings on motorways and appropriate all-purpose dual carriageway trunk roads.

It is our intention to include these markings in our consultation document on the traffic signs regulations and general directions, due to be circulated in the early autumn.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the success of experimental schemes to fit ribbed edgelines on motorways in reducing the number of accidents on motorway hard shoulders.

Mr. Atkins: The Transport and Road Research Laboratory is encouraged by the results of earlier experience and trials conducted so far. On the basis of the available evidence it is not possible to establish the likely balance of costs and benefits across the network as a whole. Conclusive research would take many years to yield results. Operationally these lines appear to offer benefits in terms of enhancing visibility and driver awareness of the edge of the carriageway. Both these factors help to reduce the risk of accidents.

Driving Offences

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he proposes to create any new categories of driving offences.

Mr. Atkins: Our proposals for the reform of road traffic law are set out in the White Paper, "The Road User and the Law" (Cm. 576). These include the creation of a new offence of "causing death by careless driving while unfit through drink or drugs" and the reformulation of the reckless driving offences. Legislation to implement these proposals will be introduced at the earliest opportunity.

Helicopters

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his approval was required for the exemption given to the helicopter companies operating over the North sea from the new rules against excessive fatigue for pilots.

Mr. McLoughlin: The statutory responsibility for the safety regulation of United Kingdom civil aviation rests with the Civil Aviation Authority (CAA). I understand that of the 540 pilots employed on offshore helicopter operations on 1 May 1990, the date of the new requirements, 10 were in excess of the new limit of 800 hours flying time in any 12-month period. Of these, the highest had completed 835 hours and was inside the old limit of 900 hours maximum.

In order to avoid grounding these pilots for approximately three months, the authority has issued exemptions valid until the end of August 1990 when all 10 will be within the new reduced maximum 12-monthly flying hours limit.

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had with British Rail and the developers of the King's Cross site about the choice of the London terminal for the channel tunnel rail link.

Mr. Freeman: The choice of preferred location for the second London terminal for channel tunnel rail services was made by British Rail. My approval to British Rail's investment plans for the station will be required before they can proceed. The terms of the agreement with the developers and other land owners are a matter for British Rail; but this Department has had discussions with British Rail and the developers on the implications for the road and public transport networks in the King's Cross area.

Traffic Forecasts

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give a geographical breakdown of the traffic forecasts which have produced the average estimates for 2025 of 83 per cent. to 142 per cent. increase in road traffic.

Mr. Atkins: The national road traffic forecasts 1989 (NRTF) apply to Great Britain as a whole. Local forecasts, consistent with the NRTF, are made where necessary when particular problems and improvements are considered. These forecasts take into account local differences and can be lower or higher than the national forecast.

London Underground

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the closure of the Circle line at Liverpool Street station on Wednesday 2 May.

Mr. Freeman: London Underground Ltd (LUL) tell me that Liverpool Street Underground Station was closed and evacuated on Wednesday 2 May betwen 09.45 and 10·20 whilst the London fire brigade attended following a report of smoke. The current was discharged to allow the firemen on to the track. The cause of the smoke was found to be burning paper, probably ignited by a train "arcing". The fire brigade extinguished the burning paper, the "all clear" was given and the station was reopened.

I understand that LUL is currently carrying out a programme of improved cleaning measures, in particular, to remove litter from the track. It is also looking of eliminating or minimising arcing of trains.

Ms. Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many fires have been reported on London underground in each of the last 12 months; for how many the fire brigade was in attendance; and how many required evacuation of the premises.

Mr. Freeman: London Underground Ltd. (LUL) tells me that the latest 12-month period for which details of fires are available is April 1989 to March 1990. The record consists of four-week periods rather than calendar months. The figures are as follows:

Period	No. of Fires Reported
[1]29.4.89	464
[1]27.5.89	584
[1]24.6.89	456
[1]22.7.89	436
[1]19.8.89	385
[1]16.9.89	398
[1]14.10.89	370
[1]11.11.89	276
[1]9.12.89	393
[1]6.1.90	259
[1]3.2.90	303
[1]3.3.90	339
[1]31.3.90	424

[1] Four weeks ending

The London fire brigade was in attendance at all fires. LUL do not keep records of evacuations of stations as a result of fires, though in 540 cases the train service either did not stop at the station or was suspended, which suggests that the station was evacuated.

It was not necessary for LUL to report all fires to the Secretary of State. Those which had to be reported fell into the categories at Schedule 1, Sections 6(d), 6(e), 7(e) and 7(f) of the Railway (Notice of Accidents) Order 1986. This was set out in the answer to the hon. Member on 23 March 1990, Official Report, c.774-75.

Supply Index

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about his Department's decision not to participate in the Government supply index.

Mr. Atkins: The Department makes use of GSI by sharing facilities with DOE. The driver and vehicle licensing agency in Swansea has its own subscription.

Heavy Goods Vehicles (First Aid Kits)

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if his Department proposes to introduce legislation to compel heavy goods vehicles to carry first aid kits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins [holding answer 3 May 1990]: Knowing the right thing to do when serious injury occurs can make the difference between life and death. I welcome the steps taken by responsible employers and by individuals themselves to spread this knowledge. Carrying a first aid kit is something that many road users sensibly already do, but it is no substitute for human common sense and knowledge and I do not propose to make it compulsory.

Nuclear Waste (Transportation)

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has concerning the draft code on nuclear waste transboundary transport drawn up by the experts panel of the International Atomic Energy Agency; how the United Kingdom was represented on the experts panel; and how the report will affect current safety regulations for nuclear materials transport in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Trippier: I have been asked to reply.

An official of the Department of the Environment attended the meeting of the expert panel which drew up the draft code of practice. Current safety regulations for the transport of all radioactive materials in the United Kingdom comply with the recommendations of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA). Any proposed changes to these recommendations resulting from the adoption of the code of practice will need to be agreed by the IAEA before they are embodied into United Kingdom law.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rural Regeneration

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what work has been undertaken by the inter-departmental committee on rural re-generation under the chairmanship of the permanent secretary in the Department of Agriculture; and when it will report its findings, proposals and recommendations.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The inter-departmental committee on rural development has been in operation since January 1990. It continues to work to its general remit of preparing advice for Ministers on how best to carry forward action to tackle the social and economic problems in the most deprived rural areas.

Discussions have taken place with district councils, the rural action project and the promoters of rural development projects. Following a recommendation from the committee it was agreed to fund the rural action project for a further year to 31 March 1991.

The committee will report to Ministers as soon as possible commensurate with a comprehensive review and positive recommendations.

Natural Gas

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the estimated cost of providing the necessary infrastructure in Northern Ireland to ensure maximum availability of natural gas in the main centres of population in Northern Ireland;

(2) what is the estimated cost of linking Northern Ireland by pipeline to the national gas grid of Great Britain.

Mr. Needham: No information is available on these costs which could only be obtained through detailed and expensive financial and technical studies.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what evidence exists of the likelihood of natural gas reserves in (a) Northern Ireland and (b) off the coastal areas of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Small amounts of natural gas have been encountered in hydrocarbon exploration wells in County Fermanagh but work on enhancing the yields to commercial levels was not considered warranted by the prospecting companies as gas shows were so small. Elsewhere in Northern Ireland some geological features exist which control the formation and accumulation of hydrocarbons but to date exploration has not confirmed the presence of any significant traces of natural gas or oil. Exploration is continuing under three prospecting licences for areas in Co. Antrim.

Little is known of the geology of the off-shore area but from what evidence is available the prospectivity of the off-shore area in the vicinity of Rathlin and East Antrim is similar to the adjacent on-shore area.

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the nearest identified source of natural gas in Great Britain to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Previous studies of the options for the supply of natural gas from Great Britain to Northern Ireland indicated that the most convenient route would be a supply via the west coast of Scotland. The studies also concluded that such a supply would not provide the basis of a viable gas industry for the Province.

DNA Profiling

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether any scientist at the Northern Ireland forensic science laboratory has published articles in peer-reviewed journals on the subject of DNA profiling.

Mr. Cope: No such articles have been published.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many samples have been taken from how many persons suspected of (a) scheduled offences and (b) non-scheduled offences, distinguishing between (i) samples taken with the consent of the suspect and (ii) samples taken without the consent, and further distinguishing between intimate, and non-intimate, excluding mouth samples, and mouth swabs as defined in schedule 14 to the Criminal Justice Act 1988, under the terms of schedule 14 to the Criminal Justice Act 1988, and subsequently under the Police and Criminal Evidence (Northern Ireland) Order 1989, since the commencement of schedule 14 to the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

Mr. Cope: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. McNamara: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he will publish in the Official Report the administrative guidelines for records of DNA samples taken from persons acquitted or not proceeded against in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Cope: Guidance to the police on the identification, by body samples, swabs and impressions, of persons detained under the general criminal law has already been published in the codes of practice issued under the Police and Criminal Evidence (NI) Order 1989 (copies of which are in the Library of the House). Guidance on the identification, by similar means, of persons detained under emergency legislation will be published shortly.

Second-level Students

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many students in second-level education reached their 19th birthday and completed their courses in each year since 1980.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is as follows:

School year	Number of 19-year-old leavers
1979-80	542
1981-82	615
1983-84	705

School year	Number of 19-year-old leavers
1985-86	789
1986-87	672
1987-88	695

Figures are not available for the school years 1980-81, 1982-83 and 1984-85 and not yet available for 1988-89.

Irish Language Teaching

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many copies of the proposals for the teaching of Irish in Irish-medium schools were sent out by the Northern Ireland Curriculum Council; how many schools were consulted; how many questions there were in the consultative proposals to be answered; weeks each school was given to reply to the consultative proposals; what was the closing date for replies; how many schools replied to the consultative proposals; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Copies were sent to all grant-aided schools and to other bodies. A total of 7,800 copies were issued and 165 responses were received, of which 50 were from teachers or schools. The copies were issued on 19 February and schools were asked to reply by 30 March, a total of six weeks. To assist the analysis of comments, the council issued a proforma which contained 25 questions but respondents were at liberty to comment also on other matters.

Extradition

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many applications relating to terrorist offences have been made for extradition from the Irish Republic to Britain (a) between 1972 and 14 November 1985 and (b) since 15 November 1985; how many have been refused; how many have been granted; and for how long any outstanding cases have been under consideration.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 March 1990]: The information is as follows:

Applications submitted (persons)	Persons returned	Extradition refused	Other[1]
1 January 1972 to 14 November 1985
80	3	38	[2]38
15 November 1985 to date
32	4	3	[2]26

[1] The category "other" includes cases where warrants were returned or withdrawn for a variety of reasons; or where the person sought was found to be deceased (2 cases) or was subsequently arrested in the United Kingdom (15 cases). There were 19 applications outstanding as at 3 April 1990; since the majority of these persons have not so far been arrested, an account of time spent by each under consideration would not be appropriate.

[2] The figures within each category do not tally because in one pre-15 November 1985 case the individual concerned was returned after that date.

Terrorism

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland which organisations were responsible for the 37 terrorist killings which have been carried out in the constituency of Fermanagh and South Tyrone since 15 November 1985; and in how many of these killings (a) someone has been convicted for murder by the courts, (b) there is a murder charge presently outstanding and (c) there has been a failure to charge anyone with murder.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 23 March 1990]: Republican terrorist groups are believed to have been responsible for each of the 37 terrorist murders about which the hon. Gentleman has asked. One person has been convicted in respect of two of them; and five persons are awaiting trial charged with two additional murders, as well as related serious offences. Police inquiries still continue in respect of the remaining 33 murders, but to date no-one has been charged.

Energy Consumption

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will give the target reductions for energy consumption in the buildings occupied by his Department.

Mr. Cope [holding answer 30 April 1990]: The target reduction for energy consumption over the period April 1990 to March 1995, on buildings occupied by the Northern Ireland Office and Northern Ireland Departments, is 15 per cent. of the total energy bill for the year 1989-90.

EC Energy Development Programme

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what applications for European Community funding under the Valoren energy development programme in respect of lignite mining or peat extraction for fuel use are currently under consideration; and if he will indicate the project name, site location, date and level of European Community funding sought.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 3 May 1990]: No such applications are under consideration.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each of the last three years those projects which have received European Community funding under the Valoren programme in respect of lignite mining or peat extraction for fuel use, and in each case indicate the project name, site location, date and level of European Community funding.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 3 May 1990]: Since the Northern Ireland Valoren programme commenced in May 1986, £23,411·35 of European Community funding has been provided to LEDU in respect of financial assistance paid to two investment projects involving the extraction and processing of peat for fuel.

Name and address of project	Amount of European funding £	Period of claim
1. Cam Peat Ltd., 84 Ringsend Road, Leck, Limavady	14,260·50	1 May 1986-31 December 1987
	5,238·35	1 January 1988-31 December 1988
Site: Cam, Macosquin, Coleraine
2. Biofuel Products (NI), The Cutts, Dunmurry, Belfast	3,912·50	1 May 1986-31 December 1987

No lignite mining projects have been assisted under the Valoren Programme.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Broadcasting

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Lord President of the Council what arrangements have been made to permit the BBC to broadcast a radio programme from a Committee Room of the House; on what terms; and whether he will make a statement.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: Arrangements have been made for a radio programme to be recorded in the Grand Committee Room. The authority for any direct broadcast from the House, other than of Proceedings of the House, is the Select Committee on House of Commons (Services); it is permissible, however, to record a meeting sponsored by an hon. Member, for broadcasting at a later date.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith), as representing the House of Commons Commission, whether any House of Commons staff are involved in the arrangements for a BBC programme to be recorded in a Committee Room of the House on 8 May; and whether any reimbursement is being made by the BBC to the Commission for staff or other costs.

Mr. Beith: Staff of the House are available to administer Committee Rooms with regard both to sittings of Committees of the House and private meetings sponsored by hon. Members; in the case of the meeting arranged in the name of the Leader of the House on 8 May no additional costs have been identified and the question of reimbursement does not arise.

Select Committees (Advisers)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will list for the current year by Committee the names, qualifications, experience and remuneration of advisers to Select Committees of the House.

Sir Geoffrey Howe: The appointment of specialist advisers is a matter for the Select Committee concerned. The names of the specialist advisers who assisted Select Committees during the 1988-89 Session of Parliament can be found in the most recent Sessional Return (HC(1989-90)110). Specialist advisers are remunerated on a per diem basis, plus travelling expenses, on the same scale as that used within the civil service for comparable appointments, which ranges between £38 and £115 per day. Details of individual remuneration are not disclosed. The total cost of specialist advice for each select committee in the financial year 1988-89 can be found in the most recent Sessional Return (HC(1989-90)110).

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Zimbabwe

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's bilateral aid to Zimbabwe.

Mrs. Chalker: I refer the hon. Member to the answers given to the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) on 24 July 1989 at column 454 and 4 December 1989 at column 9. Figures for expenditure in 1989 should be available later this month.

Poland

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 26 April, Official Report, column 282, what plans exist to increase the £2·3 million so far provided for Poland under the know-how fund.

Mrs. Chalker: We expect that expenditure under the know-how fund for Poland in 1990-91 will be considerably higher than the £2·3 million spent in 1989-90. It is too soon to predict an exact figure.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 26 April, Official Report, column 282, what plans exist to increase the size of the know-how fund.

Mrs. Chalker: Much of the £50 million know-how fund for Poland has yet to be committed to specific projects, and there are no plans to increase the size of the overall fund. As already announced, know-how funds have been extended to Hungary, East Germany and Czechoslovakia.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 26 April, Official Report, columns 282-83, what is his estimate of the number of people who have benefited from the specific training provided for potential local joint venture partners with Poland.

Mrs. Chalker: The initiative under the know-how fund relating to the training of potential local joint venture partners has been introduced only recently and detailed arrangements are being worked out. A number of companies have registered their interest in the initiative in respect of Poland and we are looking carefully at their proposals.

Bilateral Aid

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a table in the Official Report correlating for the last five years for which data are available (a) United Kingdom bilateral aid to (i) Burma, (ii) China, (iii) India, (iv) Indonesia, (v) Jordan, (vi) Malaysia, (vii) the Philippines, (viii) Sri Lanka, (ix) Thailand, (x) the Yemen Arab Republic in real and cash terms and (b) the proportions in each case of this aid tied to trade deals involving United Kingdom companies.

PRIME MINISTER

Iraq (Arms Component Exports)

Q26. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Prime Minister what information the Defence Export Services Secretariat had about the export to Iraq of steel equipment for use in weapon construction.

The Prime Minister: In the light of the charges laid against individuals on 25 April, and in the light of the continuing investigations by Customs and Excise, it would be inappropriate to give any further information.

Departmental Savings

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Prime Minister what value for money savings have been achieved by the Cabinet Office in the last year; and how much of this was as a result of advice from the central unit on purchasing.

The Prime Minister: Final figures for 1989-90 are not yet available. Provisional figures prepared for the central unit on purchasing show value for money improvements of £1,510,000 achieved by the Cabinet Office during 1989-90.

It is not possible to attribute particular value for money savings to advice from the CUP. The role of the unit is to provide advice and guidance on best purchasing practice.

Government Supply Index

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Prime Minister if she will make a statement about the Cabinet Office's decision not to participate in the Government supply index.

The Prime Minister: Because the Cabinet Office spends only a comparatively small amount on items covered by the Government supply index, full membership would not represent good value for money for the Department.

Training (Scotland)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Prime Minister if she will seek to amend the Parliamentary and Health Service Commissioners Act 1987 to include training matters in Scotland among those subject to the ombudsman's scrutiny.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State, Scottish Office, on 2 May at column 587.

Engagements

Mr. Mans: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

Mr. Wood: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

Mr. Robert G. Hughes: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

Mr. John P. Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

Mr. Stern: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 8 May.

The Prime Minister: This morning I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others, including Chancellor Vranitzky of Austria and received a delegation representing the Eisenhower centennial committee led by Vice-President Quayle of the United States of America. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today. This evening I hope to have an audience of Her Majesty the Queen.

ENERGY

Power Generation

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what is the estimated contribution to power generation in the 1990s of (a) wind power, (b) tidal power, (c) estuary barrages and (d) geothermal power.

Mr. Peter Morrison: Renewable energy technologies are at an early stage of development and there is great uncertainty about future projections. No estimates are available for the 1990s. Longer term estimates for 2025 have been published in Energy Paper 55, copies of which are in the Library of the House.

British Coal

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy, pursuant to his intervention of 4 December 1989, Official Report, column 41, what was the value of British Coal on 31 March 1990.

Mr. Wakeham: The value of British Coal as at 31 March 1990 will depend on a detailed assessment of the earnings potential of each mine over its remaining life. I expect this work to be completed by late summer. I cannot prejudge in the meantime what this final figure will be. I have, however, satisfied myself that under any likely scenario over half the Corporation's collieries are likely to show a negative cash flow over their remaining lives, and that this will lead to the write-off of at least half the industry's £4 billion fixed assets. On this basis, and taking into account the losses incurred in 1989-90 and earlier years, I have in accordance with section 1(3)(b) of the Coal Industry Act 1990, paid British Coal an interim sum of £3 billion in deficiency grant. This sum was paid on 29 March 1990 and allowed an immediate and corresponding repayment of outstanding debt.

UKAEA

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy whether he will make a statement on the chairmanship of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority.

Mr. Wakeham: I have today appointed Mr. John Maltby as part-time chairman of the United Kingdom Atomic Energy Authority from 1 July 1990 in succession to Mr. John Collier. This appointment is for three years.

Dr. Brian Eyre's appointment as a full-time member of the UKAEA which was due to expire on 31 July 1992 will now expire on 30 April 1995. The UKAEA has appointed Dr. Eyre as chief executive and deputy chairman.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Fraud

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Attorney-General what is the practice of the prosecution authorities in cases of fraud involving sums of money in excess of £1 million; what is the Director of Public Prosecution's policy where culprits are over the age of 67 years; what consideration is given to the length of time a crime has remained undetected; and what consideration is being given to the implications for prosecution policy in respect of the War Crimes Bill of these policies.

The Attorney-General: The principles set out in the code for Crown prosecutors promulgated by the Director of Public Prosecutions under section 10 of the Prosecution Offences Act 1985, govern all decisions taken by the Crown prosecution service including those relating to alleged fraud. First, the evidence must be sufficient to afford a realistic prospect of conviction; second, the circumstances must be such that the public interest requires a prosecution.

The factors referred to in the hon. Members question are relevant to assessment of the public interest which can arise only if the evidential criterion is satisfied. The sum involved goes directly to the seriousness of the offence which, together with any aggravating features, for example, persistence or breach of trust, must be balanced against other factors militating against prosecution such as advanced age. So far as time elapsing since the commission of a crime is concerned, the Crown prosecution service is slow to prosecute if the last offence was committed three or more years before the probable date of trial, unless, despite its staleness, an immediate custodial sentence of some length is likely to be imposed. Less regard will be paid to staleness, however, if it is contributed to by the accused himself, the complexity of this case has necessitated lengthy police investigation or the particular characteristics of the offence have themselves contributed to the delay in its coming to light. Generally, the graver the allegation the less significance will be attached to the element of staleness.

If Parliament enacts the War Crimes Bill currently before it, the same principles will apply to the offences made justiciable by that legislation.

Mr. Gorst: To ask the Attorney-General what progress has been made in the investigations into allegations of a £1 million fraud by Mr. Alex Swern and Mr. Laurence Rosen; whether the police have now completed their investigations; when a decision with regard to prosecution will be made by the Director of Public Prosecutions; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: A report relating to the case to which the hon. Member refers was submitted to the Crown prosecution service on 30 March 1990. Having considered the report and had the benefit of advice from counsel, the Crown prosecution service concluded that the criteria set out in the code for Crown prosecutors were not satisfied. The Metropolitan police were advised that no proceedings should be instituted against either proposed defendant.

PO John Black, RN

Mr. Latham: To ask the Attorney-General when he anticipates that he will be heard by the court on his application for a fresh inquest into the death of Petty Officer John Black, RN in Spain in December 1983; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: The case is in the warned list for hearing during the current law term, but no date has yet been fixed for the hearing. I will write to my hon. Friend informing him of the hearing date as soon as it is fixed.

Social Security Commissioners

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Attorney-General what is the average delay between a social security commissioner's oral hearing and notification of the decision to the claimant; and how much of this is ascribable to administrative delay.

The Attorney-General: The average time taken between the oral hearing by a commissioner and the despatch of the decision to the parties for the quarter ending March 1990 was 105 days, of which it is estimated that the time taken in processing decisions by administrative staff, including typists, was 50 days.

The Lord Chancellor's Department and the Office of the Social Security Commissioners are actively considering ways of reducing delay in this area.

Lottery Tickets

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General what consideration has been given by the Crown prosecution service to initiating proceedings in relation to the posting of lottery tickets to the United Kingdom from West German state and institutional lottery groups; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: No such case can be identified within the Crown prosecution service from the information that is given. If the hon. Gentleman will write to me setting out more details about the alleged offence, I will cause further inquiries to be made.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Poland

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 26 April, Official Report, column 282-83, how many companies have taken advantage of the investment protection and promotion agreement which exists for Poland; and what is the value of such contracts.

Mr. Waldegrave: This information is not held centrally, since companies are not obliged to notify the Government in order to benefit from the existence of an IPPA.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth dated 25 April, what plans exist to increase the £150,000 currently made available by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office under the scholarships and awards scheme to enable Polish students to study in Britain.

Mr. Sainsbury: We are looking at ways of increasing the overall provision for students from eastern Europe, including Poland, to study in the United Kingdom under the Foreign and Commonwealth Office scholarships and awards scheme.

Vietnamese Boat People

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Vietnamese boat people refused refugee status by the Hong Kong authorities have been accepted by the UNHCR under its own mandate.

Mr. Maude: The UNHCR has chosen to exercise its mandate on behalf of 106 refugees so far. This is less than 1 per cent. of cases decided by the Hong Kong Immigration Department and the refugee status review board (RSRB).

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the reasons why refugee status review boards sit in closed private session when reviewing cases of Vietnamese boat people refused refugee status.

Mr. Maude: The refugee status review board (RSRB) perform an administrative rather than a judicial function. It replaces a function originally performed by the Executive Council which also sits in closed private sessions during its deliberations. Although the refugee status review board make its final decisions in private session, a representative of the UNHCR is allowed to be present when a board interviews an asylum seeker. UNHCR and its operating partner, the agency for volunteer service (AVS), also have the opportunity to make representations on individual cases, before the final decision is taken, at their weekly meeting with the chairman of the board.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide for Vietnamese boat people's legal representatives to be allowed to attend screening interviews and sessions of the refugee status review boards.

Mr. Maude: The purpose of the screening interview is to record and assess the facts relating to an asylum seeker's claim to refugee status. The presence of a legal representative would serve little purpose in this context. The refugee status review board does invite UNHCR legal counsellors to be present during its interviews and a copy of the record is made available for comment.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will provide for a legal adviser to be assigned to each Vietnamese boat person applying for refugee status before screening.

Mr. Maude: The provision for legal services to asylum seekers is not the responsibility of the Hong Kong Government. Under the statement of understanding agreed between UNHCR and the Hong Kong Government in September 1988, UNHCR accepted responsibility for providing legal advice to asylum seekers at all stages of the screening and review procedures. Legal aid is not available in Hong Kong except in the High Court and the district court.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give the figures for the number of cases regarding the refusal of refugee status to Vietnamese boat peope by refugee status review boards that have been decided (a) unanimously or (b) by a majority.

Mr. Maude: An application for review of a negative decision can be rejected only if all members of the review panel decide that the review should not be allowed. If one member of the panel decides in favour of the asylum seeker, the director of immigration's decision will be overturned. Any decision against the asylum seeker must therefore be unanimous.

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will take steps to ensure that Vietnamese boat people awaiting screening for refugee status receive a written description of the nature and conduct of the process in Vietnamese before interview.

Mr. Maude: Under paragraph 6 of the comprehensive plan of action agreed at the UN conference in Geneva last June, provision of information about screening is the responsibility of UNHCR. They have distributed in all centres an information book describing the status determination procedures.

Refugee Law

Mr. Alton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has held with the UNHCR, the Law Society and the Bar Association regarding the possibility of lawyers from outside Hong Kong with expertise in refugee law being allowed to practise in Hong Kong.

Mr. Maude: UNHCR employs lawyers from outside Hong Kong as full-time legal counsellors to monitor the screening procedures. In addition, UNHCR provides individual legal representation at the review stage through its operating partner the agency for voluntary services (AVS). The AVS has, with the approval of the Law Society, been allowed to recruit lawyers from outside Hong Kong for this purpose.

Hong Kong

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many Vietnamese boat people have escaped from Hong Kong detention camps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 4 May 1990]: In 1989, 2,033 Vietnamese boat people escaped from the camps. The figure so far this year is 2,254. In most cases, the motive for escaping is to visit relatives in other camps or often simply to walk about Hong Kong, rather than to try to escape from the territory. Most of those who escape are returned to their camps.

Ivory

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the current size of ivory stocks in Hong Kong; and on what date it was assessed.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 23 April 1990]: The current size of commercial ivory stocks in Hong Kong was 472 tonnes (to the nearest tonne) as at 21 April 1990.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 5 April, Official Report, column 765, if he will state the amount of ivory involved in each of the recent seizures; from whom it was seized; and what was the country of origin of the ivory and the current whereabouts of the ivory together with his proposals for its disposal.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 23 April 1990]: The following seizures of ivory were made by the special task force of the Customs and Excise Department in Hong Kong between 1 June 1989 and 22 March 1990:

Quantity (kg)		Seized from	Country of Export
58·9	raw ivory	Kim Ki Woo	Korea
15	raw ivory (powder)	Au Kin Choi	China
8·5	raw ivory	Tsai Shin Sheng	Taiwan
11·7	worked ivory	Abandoned by Choi Don-soo	Korea
7·55	worked ivory	Lau Ming Hei	Thailand
0·2	worked ivory	Yue Hwa Chinese Product Emporium Ltd.	Japan
2·9	worked ivory	Lam Kin Pui	Taiwan
7·19	raw ivory	Kwong Fat Cheung Ivory and Mahjong	Japan
700	raw ivory	Pei Lei Lai Kai	Singapore
15·5	mammoth ivory	Lee Chor Mui	Japan
2·3	worked ivory	Andrew Stephen Yuen	Thailand
100	worked ivory	Sun Hung Ngai Trading Company	USA
55	worked ivory	Wong Wing Shing	Spain
4	worked ivory	Unclaimed baggage	France
26·3	worked ivory	Art of Sea Ivory Company	China
3·1	worked ivory	Liu Shih Haiao	Taiwan
3·8	worked ivory	Shih Shia Loon	Taiwan
1·3	worked ivory	Fang Tsu Chick	Thailand
2·5	worked ivory	Chang Lin Kuei Chuo	Taiwan
17·5	worked ivory	Left by Transit Passenger	Thailand

The confiscated ivory is kept in the Hong Kong Government stores. The Hong Kong Government have no plans at present to dispose of the confiscated items.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 5 April, Official Report, column 765, if he will state (a) the period covered from 26 February during which 35 kg of ivory was exported from Hong Kong, (b) how much ivory has been exported since that date; and to which countries it was exported.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 23 April 1990]: The period covered was from 26 February to 30 March 1990. The Hong Kong CITES management authority has not been notified of any ivory exports since 30 March 1990.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is going to happen to the 116 tonnes of ivory currently held in Hong Kong without CITES documentation.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 23 April 1990]: The owners may continue to keep the ivory under possession licence or to dispose of it locally. But export licences will not be issued for any exports.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to apply isotope analysis to ivory stocks in Hong Kong to ascertain their place of origin.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 23 April 1990]: We do not propose to take a view on whether to apply isotope analysis to ivory stocks in Hong Kong until the technique has been properly evaluated. As my hon. Friend, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, stated in his reply of 13 November to the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), the proposals concerning this technique were not discussed in any of the formal sessions at the CITES conference in October 1989. But we will study any information which may be forthcoming about these techniques in consultation with our scientific advisers.

Endangered Species

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his reply of 5 April, Official Report, column 764, if he will give details of the items which led to 92 prosecutions being initiated by the Hong Kong authorities.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 23 April 1990]: Ninety-two prosecutions were initiated by the Hong Kong authorities in the second half of 1989 as a result of confiscation of the following items:

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criteria are used to determine the location, number and frequency of restaurant inspections in Hong Kong to ensure that no rare and endangered species of animals and plants are offered for sale as food; and what information he has on the number of restaurants in Hong Kong.

Mr. Waldegrave [holding answer 23 April 1990]: The criteria used to determine the location, number and frequence of restaurant inspections in Hong Kong, for the purpose of ensuring that no rare and endangered species of animals and plants are offered for sale as food, include known black spots, reports and intelligence from various sources and the type of restaurant and menu served. Random checks are made as a deterrent. There are approximately 7,400 restaurants in Hong Kong.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Immigration

Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many overstayers were deported in the latest available year where evidence has been brought forward that they were in stable marriages to British citizens with the right of abode.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the results of the police and immigration officers' investigation carried out at weddings being held on 21 April at (a) Hackney and (b) Walthamstow and (i) how many people were detained, (ii) how many have since been charged and (iii) with what offence.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In a joint Metropolitan police/immigration service operation on 21 April, eight persons were arrested on suspicion of conspiracy to contravene the Immigration Act 1971. Three persons were arrested at Hackney register office; four in a simultaneous visit to an address in Walthamstow; and one further arrest was made at a separate address later that day.

Three of those arrested were subsequently released without charge and two persons have been given bail to return to the police station on 15 May. Three persons have been charged with conspiracy to contravene the Immigration Act 1971 contrary to section 1(1) of the Criminal Law Act 1977 (as amended)—two remanded in custody, the third released on bail.

Television Licences

Mr. Canavan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many representations he has received over the past 12 months about concessionary television licences for retirement pensioners and disabled people.

Mr. Mellor: In the year ending 21 March 1990 we received four petitions and 696 letters calling for reduced price or free television licences for pensioners or disabled people. A total of 385 of the letters were cyclostyled, and clearly sent as part of a local campaign. Of the rest 139 were from hon. Members, and three of the petitions were submitted through them.

Police Houses

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police houses are vacant in (a) Cardiff and (b) South Glamorgan; and what proportion this is of the total police housing stock in (a) the city and (b) the county.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: This information is not held centrally, but I understand from the South Wales constabulary that there are currently 11 vacant police houses in south Glamorgan which represent 14 per cent. of the total police housing stock in the county. Six of these vacant police houses are in Cardiff and represent 11 per cent. of the total police housing stock in the city.

Strangeways Prison

Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the future of Strangeways prison, Manchester.

Mr. Waddington: As I said on 3 May in exchanges following the question from my hon. Friend the member for Staffordshire, Moorlands (Mr. Knox), an assessment of the structural damage to the wings at Manchester is being made. When it is completed, we shall review the various options for the prison's future. I can see the attractions, and the importance to the staff, of bringing at least part of the prison back into use as soon as possible.

Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to ensure that the costs of policing the Strangeways riot will be met fully by central Government.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Greater Manchester police authority has asked for a meeting to discuss the financial implications of policing the Strangeways disturbance. We will listen carefully to its points but any request for special assistance would have to be judged against the normal criteria of exceptional and unforeseen expenditure of a scale that threatens the efficiency of the force.

Mr. Litherland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he is satisfied that the governor of Strangeways prison, Manchester was given every facility necessary to quell the riot at that prison.

Mr. Waddington: Considerable support was afforded to the governor of Manchester under contingency arrangements. The available support will be among the matters which Lord Justice Woolf's inquiry will address.

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what consultations took place in the first 24 hours of the riot at Strangeways prison about the use of force.

Mr. Mellor [holding answer 30 April 1990]: The Governor of Manchester prison, the acting regional director and the deputy director general of the prison service were in frequent consultation about the tactics to be adopted in dealing with the disturbance.

Detentions (Manchester Airport)

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give figures for the number of people arriving at Manchester airport over the last three months who have been detained.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: A total of 22 people who arrived at Manchester airport during the first three months of this year were detained for one or more nights.

Deportations

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will give the number of deportations of permanent residents arising out of criminal convictions in England and Wales in the last six months; and if he will give the proportion of those which were not recommended by the courts.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In the second six months of 1989, a total of 164 persons were removed from the United Kingdom under the deportation process on the recommendation of a court following conviction for a criminal offence (section 3(6) of the Immigration Act 1971). A further 32 were deported on the ground that deportation was conducive to the public good following a criminal conviction (section 3(5)(b)). Separate information is not readily available for those who were settled in the United Kingdom.

Football Licensing Authority

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps have been taken towards establishing the Football Licensing Authority.

Mr. John Patten: Responsibility for the establishment of the Football Licensing Authority has been transferred to the Home Office. My right hon. and learned Friend made a commencement order under the Football Spectators Act 1989 on 21 March providing for the Football Licensing Authority to be set up from 1 June 1990.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the chairman and members of the Football Licensing Authority will be appointed.

Mr. John Patten: Appointments to the Football Licensing Authority will be made as soon as possible.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what date has been set for the commencement of operation of the Football Licensing Authority.

Mr. John Patten: The Football Licensing Authority will begin its operation as soon as possible.

Lottery Tickets (Germany)

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on how many occasions he has raised with the West German authorities the practice of sending lottery tickets from Germany to the United Kingdom in breach of the Lotteries and Amusements Act; what assurances he has had on each occasion; and what action he now proposes in light of the continued posting of such tickets to United Kingdom citizens from West German state and institutional lottery groups.

Mr. John Patten: At our request, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office last year initiated exchanges with authorities in the Federal Republic of West Germany about the postal promotion here of two lotteries based in West Germany, contrary to the Lotteries and Amusements Act 1976, and these exchanges are continuing. Most recently, the director of each lottery has undertaken to draw to the notice of its agents that the mass promotion of the lottery in another country where that is unlawful is contrary to the rules under which the agents operate.

Together with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, we will consider what other effective action may be taken if the mass postal promotion of these lotteries continues. The promotion here of these and other foreign lotteries is already inhibited by steps which have been taken domestically. Among these is that HM Customs and Excise have impounded, for subsequent destruction, very substantial quantities of promotional material for them.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement providing guidance to United Kingdom citizens about the appropriate action to take with lottery tickets sent to them by West German state and institutional lotteries and about the legal position over the sale of such tickets in the United Kingdom.

Mr. John Patten: The promotion or conduct of public foreign lotteries in Great Britain is unlawful under the Lotteries and Amusements Act 1976. It is not an offence under the Act to purchase tickets in such lotteries. But the Act defines a range of activities connected with unlawful lotteries which are themselves unlawful. These activities include the bringing into Great Britain of foreign lottery material; its sale, distribution or advertisement in this country; and the sending or attempted sending out of money or other valuables received in connection with such a lottery. Together, where appropriate, with the Gaming Board for Great Britain, Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, we take action to prevent or curtail the promotion of foreign lotteries contrary to the Act.

We already explain this in reply to correspondence from Members of Parliament and of the public who write to us about the unlawful promotion here, by post, of foreign lotteries, including some based in West Germany.

Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987

Mr. Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 20th April, Official Report, column 1030, what were the departure points of those passengers without proper documentation which led to airlines being fined under the carriers' liability legislation since its introduction in March 1987.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Information before 1 July 1989 is not readily available. In the last six months of that year airline passengers giving rise to charges under the Carriers' Liability Act arrived in the United Kingdom from almost 200 primary ports of embarkation. I will write to the hon. Member enclosing the full list. Listed are the 42 airports from which more than 50 such passengers departed for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 20 April, Official Report, column 1030, how many passengers whose arrival without proper documentation resulted in fines under the carrier liability legislation claimed refugee status.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The information requested is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average outstanding fine of those women prisoners serving sentences for non-payment of fines.

Mr. Mellor: The amount of fine outstanding is not recorded centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the average weekly earnings of women prisoners.

Mr. Mellor: Inmates' pay schemes and the calculations made of average earnings make no distinction between male and female prisoners. For details of average earnings for all prisoners, I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the right hon. Member for Morley and Leeds, South (Mr. Rees) on 18 April at column 910.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what proportion of women in prison were convicted of crimes involving violence;

(2) if he will list the numbers of women in prison according to the category of their offence.

Mr. Mellor: The readily available information relates to the sentenced population and was published in table 8 of "The Prison Population in 1989", Home Office statistical bulletin 12/90.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the daily average number of women in prison (a) in 1980, (b) in 1985 and (c) in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Mellor: The average number of females in prison service establishments in England and Wales, including those held in police cells, was 1,536 in 1980, 1,540 in 1985 and 1,768 in 1989. This information is published annually in "Prison Statistics England and Wales" (table 1.5 of the latest report (Cm 825)), copies of which are in the Library.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the average weekly cost per inmate of running a women's prison.

Mr. Mellor: The average weekly cost per inmate in a female establishment during 1988-89 (the latest year for which information is available) was £399.

Prisoners (Dependent Children)

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of (a) men and (b) women prisoners have dependent children under the age of 16 years.

Mr. Mellor: The information requested is not available.

IBA (Transmission Functions)

Miss Emma Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the ownership restrictions which are to be placed upon the transmission company which is to take over the Independent Broadcasting Authority's transmission functions.

Mr. Mellor: Our announcement of 4 July last year recognised that the private transmission company which takes over the IBA's transmission operation will have a powerful market position, and that economic as well as technical regulation would be necessary. This will be achieved through the licensing regime of the Telecommunications Act 1984. A working draft of a licence to be issued under the Act for this purpose was circulated during the Broadcasting Bill's Committee stage. The licence will enable regulation to be carried out by the Director General of Telecommunications in order to ensure that the transmission market operates fairly and that transmission standards are maintained.

We also consider that the transmission company should be subject from the outset to certain ownership restrictions in order to promote greater competition in broadcasting and telecommunications. It is intended that the total holdings of Channel 3 and Channel 5 licensees (or the ITV franchise holder before 1993) should not exceed 20 per cent., so as to guard against excessive vertical integration and to ensure that competition for these services is not restricted when the BBC's system enters the market. Because it already has a significant hold over the broadcasting communications market we also propose to limit any BT shareholding to no more than 20 per cent. The necessary provisions will be included in the new company's Telecommunications Act licence. In addition, whilst the BBC's transmission system remains in public hands, it will not be allowed any holding in the private transmission company.

Our long-term aim is to remove the ownership restrictions on BT and the Channel 3 and 5 franchisees when the market allows. We will therefore review the need for either of these restrictions when we consider that circumstances have changed in such a way as to call for the position to be reassessed. If the need for either restriction has not already been reviewed prior to the privatisation of the BBC's transmission system, it will be reviewed at that point.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Criminal Injuries Compensation Scheme

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the number of cases awaiting settlement under the criminal injuries compensation scheme as at 31 March 1988, 31 March 1989 and 31 March 1990 or the latest available date identifying the numbers of prisoners and police staff included in those totals; and if he will provide a similar analysis for cases awaiting settlement under the scheme involving residents of the Northern region.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 2 May 1990]: The published figures for cases awaiting settlement under the scheme are 78,000 on 31 March 1988 and 82,000 on 31 March 1989. These figures reflect the difference between he board's cumulative record since 1964 of the number of cases received and settled. On that basis over 100,000 cases would now be outstanding whereas a physical count of cases showed that on 31 March 1990, the number outstanding was about 87,000. I am pleased to be assured by the board that this lower figure accurately reflects the caseload on that date.

The board does not record numbers of applications received from separate categories of applicant, or on a regional basis.

Schools (Ethnic Composition)

20. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement about the freedom of parents to withdraw children from schools on the basis of racial mix.

Mr. Macgregor: Under section 6 of the Education Act 1980, parents have the right to express a preference as to the school they wish their child to attend. Such preferences can be expressed at any time. Local education authorities and school governors must comply with a parent's preference if the school concerned has a suitable place available. If there is competition for places, authorities and governors cannot allocate them on racial grounds.

Dr. Reid: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if parents' rights to choose educational establishments on grounds of ethnic composition is to apply to nursery provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: This issue has arisen in a number of separate discussions that my right hon. Friend has had with the National Union of Teachers. Its leaders know how much we value the professionalism and hard work being shown by the great majority of teachers and understand our concern that the growing public recognition of this could easily be undermined by action which disrupts children's education and which lowers the standing of the teaching profession.

Further and Higher Education

24. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what percentage of (a) English and (b) Cornish children go into further and higher education.

Mr. Jackson: Twenty-nine per cent. of all English school leavers go on the full-time courses in further and higher education; whereas 37 per cent. of Cornish school leavers do so. Mrs. Rumbold: The interim advisory committee on school teachers' pay and conditions foresees substantial gains in the self-confidence of teachers as the Government's education reforms are successfully introduced. The recommendations of the committee should significantly increase the attractiveness of teaching as a profession. My right hon. Friend announced on 5 April that he had decided to accept all the committee's recommendations, subject to some minor modifications. They will be implemented in full by 1 January 1991.

41. Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out his latest estimate of teacher shortages in inner London.

Mrs. Rumbold: The Inner London education authority estimated in March that there were 200 uncovered teacher vacancies in inner London. These posts were being filled by the use of supply teachers and by other short-term measures.

45. Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the role his Department is taking in the fight against drug abuse by young people.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Under the national curriculum, all maintained schools in England are now required to provide education about drug misuse. In 1990-91 the Department is supporting a £7 million programme of LEA expenditure on preventive health education. This will include education about drugs. Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon Friend is not at present contemplating a change in the law in the light of the recent judicial decisions in the case R. v London Borough of Greenwich, ex parte the Governors of John Ball primary school. The law has been stated, and local education authorities and governors will in future have to take account of it in their school admission policies. The Department will, however, continue to keep the situation under review.

(2) what representations Her Majesty's Government have made to the European Community to increase numbers of Polish students studying in western centres of advanced education.

Mr. Jackson: As my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment made clear in the House on 3 May in the debate on the Commission's proposal, the Government welcomes and supports increased opportunities for Polish students to study in the Community under the TEMPUS programme. The United Kingdom has supported the proposed programme since it was originally discussed by the European Council in Strasbourg on 8-9 December 1989 and has worked actively for its adoption.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science, pursuant to his reply of 27 April, Official Report, column 337, what plans exist to increase further the number of full-time students from Poland taking higher education courses in universities, polytechnics and other publicly funded colleges.

Mr. Jackson: The Government welcome students from Poland, as from any other country, who wish to study in the United Kingdom, but it is for individual universities, polytechnics and colleges to determine how many such students to provide for. The Government are looking at ways of increasing publicly-funded support to enable such students to study here.

Foreign Languages

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many people in the United Kingdom are estimated to have a workable knowledge of two, three or more than three European Community languages.

Mrs. Rumbold: Of the 656,000 pupils who left school in England in 1987-88, 260,200 had a graded result at GCSE (or O level/CSE) in at least one European Community language other than English. Of these, 216,700 had a graded result in only one such language, 41,800 had graded results in two and 1,700 had graded results in three or more.

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many teachers of Spanish, French, German and Italian there are in the United Kingdom at the secondary level.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The numbers of modern language teachers in maintained secondary schools in England in March 1988 were as follows:

	Spanish	French	German	Other modern languages
Number of full-time teachers teaching the language	1,800	17,400	6,300	900
Of which, the number for whom this was their main teaching subject	600	11,800	2,800	300

The numbers of teachers of Italian within the figures for "other modern languages" are too small to estimate reliably.

Information on teachers in the rest of the United Kingdom is the responsibility of my right honourable Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science at what age schoolchildren begin to study a foreign language.

Mrs. Rumbold: Under the national curriculum, all pupils will be required to study a modern language from the age of 11 and will continue such study throughout the five years of compulsory secondary schooling. Primary and middle schools are free to provide foreign language teaching outside the national curriculum to pupils aged under 11, if they have the necessary staffing and other resources to do so.

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many places there are in universities for students to learn Spanish, French, German and Italian.

Mr. Jackson: Information about the numbers of places available for students to study specific subjects is not held centrally. The data below show the numbers of full and part-time students, both undergraduates and post-graduates of both home and overseas domicile, studying at United Kingdom universities during the academic year 1988-89.

Mr. Batiste: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the initiatives to promote the study of a foreign language in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Rumbold: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave him on 27 March 1990 at column 172. We set up last August a national curriculum working group for modern foreign languages which is expected to recommend, by July 1990, attainment targets and programmes of study for modern foreign languages based on current best practice, in order to raise standards and to promote a stimulating and worthwhile challenge to pupils of all abilities during their period of compulsory secondary schooling. We aim to start implementing the attainment targets and programmes of study in schools from autumn 1992. I am sending my hon. Friend a copy of the working group's initial advice which was published on 15 March. The national curriculum applies to England and Wales.

The teaching of modern foreign languages in Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland is the responsibility, respectively, of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland, for Wales and for Northern Ireland.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what have been the percentage cuts in the university departments teaching oriental and African languages in the last five years in respect of (a) undergraduate and (b) postgraduate provision.

Mr. Jackson: Following the 1986 Parker report on Oriental and African language and area studies in universities, the University Grants Committee allocated £1·5 million to strengthen teaching and research in these subjects.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will give the numbers of students in British universities studying oriental and African languages for the years 1986-87, 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Mr. Jackson: The information covers university full-time and part-time students, undergraduates and postgraduates. Information for the academic year beginning in 1989 is not yet available centrally.

ECCTIS 2000 Ltd.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the contractual connection between the Department of Education and Science and ECCTIS 2000 Ltd;

(2) if he will make a statement on the practice of his Department to refer inquiries about university courses to the firm ECCTIS 2000 Ltd.

Mr. Jackson: The education counselling and credit transfer information service (ECCTIS) is a database of courses in further and higher education which has been developed by the Department to provide a comprehensive source of computerised information for students and others inquiring about the availability of courses in particular subjects. Following a limited tender exercise, ECCTIS has been managed and operated since 1 January 1990 on behalf of the Department by ECCTIS 2000 Ltd., under a contract which runs until 31 December 1994.

The Department does not itself hold details of all courses available and it is its practice to refer inquirers to ECCTIS where the circumstances of the inquiry suggest that this would be appropriate.

School Closures, Richmond and Barnes

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many schools were closed in each of the past five years within the constituency of Richmond and Barnes.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Information at constituency level is not available centrally. The number of schools which have closed in each of the last five years in the Richmond local education authority area was as follows:

	Number of schools closed
1985	2
1986	0
1987	0
1988	[1]2
1989	[2]3

[1] Closed for the purpose of amalgamation.
[2] Two schools closed for the purpose of amalgamation.

Conflict Resolution

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what action his Department is taking to encourage the national curriculum council to examine ways of integrating the teaching of non-violent conflict resolution into specific subject or project ideas;

(2) what measures he is taking to ensure that human rights education takes place throughout the schools system;

(3) what account Her Majesty's inspectors of schools are taking of the recommendation contained in the report "Violence and Conflict Resolution in Schools" concerning the implementation of human rights education.

Mrs. Rumbold: The requirement for a balanced and broad based curriculum which promotes the spiritual, moral, cultural, mental and physical development of pupils, as set out in section 1 of the Education Reform Act, represents an effective framework for the provision of human rights education. HMI will, as a priority, be looking at all pupils' access to the whole curriculum. The National Curriculum council proposes to issue curriculum guidance to schools covering a range of cross-curriculum themes, including citizenship, which contribute to the personal and social education of all pupils.

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps his Department is taking to ensure that teacher training courses in classroom management include aspects relating to problem solving, interpersonal relations, conflict resolution and mediation.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend has provided that as regards in-service training the management of pupil behaviour has been designated as a national priority area within the local education authority training grants scheme, attracting the higher rate of grant on expenditure of up to £1·7 million in 1990-91. In addition, the revised criteria for the approval of initial teacher training courses which he introduced with effect from 1 January 1990 provide that all such courses should include compulsory and clearly identifiable elements of practical training in the management of pupil behaviour. It is for the course providers to decide on the content of these courses with the objective of achieving good standards of classroom behaviour.

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) when he received the report "Violence and Conflict Resolution in Schools" published by the council for cultural co-operation of the Council of Europe in July 1989, and what response he proposes to make to the recommendation on the teaching of non-violent conflict resolution as part of the curriculum;

(2) what assessment he has made of the contribution to the recommendations of the report "Violence and Conflict Resolution in Schools" by the council of cultural co-operation of the Council of Europe 1989 could make to tackling the problems of aggression, violence and vandalism in schools.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend received a copy of the report last January. The report has not been forwarded formally to Governments, but is still under study within the Council of Europe. The report will contribute to the continuing debate on this important matter and my right hon. Friend will be interested to see the Council's comments once its work has been completed.

Parental Rights

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps have been taken to increase parents' rights to choose a school for their child; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: This Government have done more than any other to increase parents' chances of getting the school they want for their child. Under the Education Act 1980, parents have the right to express a preference as to the school at which they want their child educated and, unless certain specified reliefs apply, that preference has to be met by the local education authority and governors concerned. The more open enrolment provisions of the Education Reform Act build on this solid foundation and, by taking account of the physical capacity of schools, will give to all parents an even better chance of getting the school that they want for their child.

Student Statistics

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out for 1979-80, 1984-85 and 1989-90 or the latest available figures the number of students (i) in secondary education, (ii) entered for (a) CSE and (b) GCE O levels in (1) drama, (2) music and (3) art, (iii) entered for GCE A levels in each of the above subjects, (iv) receiving individual tuition in a musical instrument and (v) entering (1) drama school, (2) music college and (3) art school.

Mrs. Rumbold: Not all the information is available in the requested form. The numbers of school leavers attempting public examinations in music and art were as follows:

Teacher Vacancies

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will publish a table of full-time teacher vacancies in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools for January 1990, broken down by aggregate total, school type and subject area for England.

Mr. MacGregor: The information is not yet available.

Contraception

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what research is being undertaken on contraception; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jackson: The main agency through which the Government support medical research is the Medical Research Council (MRC), which receives its grant-in-aid from the Department of Education and Science.

PICKUP

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will provide, for the universities located in Scotland, disaggregated PICKUP full-time equivalents by vocational category for the academic years 1985-86 to 1988-89.

Mr. Jackson [holding answer 23 April 1990]: Information on PICKUP courses in universities is not available before 1987-88. Figures for 1987-88 and 1988-89 are as follows:

EMPLOYMENT

Departmental Expenditure

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total amount spent for each standard region and for Great Britain as a whole, in both cash and real terms, by his Department, the employment service and the Training Agency, formerly Manpower Services Commission, in each year since 1979-80; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The information requested is not available for standard economic planning regions.

The total amount spent in cash terms by the Department of Employment is available from the appropriation accounts for the relevant year. (Volume 2, class IV for 1979-80, volume 4, class IV for each of the years 1980-81 to 1985-86 and volume 5, class VII for 1986-87 to 1988-89).

Real-terms expenditure can be derived by applying the GDP deflator to the cash total for the year in question.

Vocational Training

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the contribution made to employment in the United Kingdom by the European Communities European centre for the development of vocational training.

Mr. Eggar: The chief purpose of the European centre for the development of vocational training (CEDEFOP) is to support the work of the European Commission and others in promoting training at Community level. It does this through a programme to co-ordinate initiatives, by disseminating research and information and by proposing innovative means of tackling training issues across the Community. It therefore does not have a direct effect on employment in the United Kingdom beyond promoting the benefits of training.

Social Fund

Mr. John Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether there have been any delays by his Department in the allocations of the European social fund; when decisions will be made in these allocations and whether allocations to the non-statutory sector will be equal to their funding from this source in 1989.

Mr. Eggar: The reform of the European Community's structural funds imposes an entirely new procedure for deciding ESF allocations in 1990, with many new tasks falling to Member States. My Departmment has been working with applicants to revise operational programmes according to the requirements set out in the European Commission's community support frameworks, so that the agreement of the Commission can be obtained. I will shortly be making proposals about allocations. As the European Commission is providing the United Kingdom with less money in 1990 than in 1989, no sector can be guaranteed the same allocation as last year.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment in what month ESF programme funding has been paid out to voluntary organisations in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Eggar: ESF payments have been made to voluntary organisations during the following months:

1987: July, August, September, October, November and December.
1988: Payments made in every month.
1989: Payments made in every month.
1990: January, February, March, April, to date.

These payments were for activities started in the same year, and for those completed in preceding years.

The same information in respect of earlier years before records were computerised, can only be provided at a disproportionate cost.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what conclusions he has drawn about the action of those voluntary organisations which have continued to run training programmes since January 1990 before being told whether they had ESF funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My department informs all applicants to the European social fund that because of the European Community procedures for handling applications many applicants may need to start their projects without certainty of any ESF support. This has always been the case, and remains so following the reform of the Community's structural funds.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many training places with Scottish voluntary organisations supported by ESF funding are being provided in the current years.

Mr. Eggar: There have been no decisions announced regarding individual organisations' ESF support for 1990. Therefore I cannot say how many training places will be funded for the Scottish voluntary organisations this year.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when (1) he will issue application forms to voluntary organisations for the European social fund programme starting in 1990;

(2) whether he has any proposals for improving the administration of ESF applications from voluntary organisations.

Mr. Eggar: This is the first year of operation of the major reform of the Community's structural funds including the European social fund, and entirely new application procedures are being developed. My Department has been working with the European Commission and applicant organisations to determine these new procedures and hopes to be able to issue project application forms and guidance within the next month. As the new procedures are implemented, they will be reviewed in the light of experience.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if ESF money is used by the Government to subsidise benefit payments on the employment training programme.

Mr. Eggar: The ESF supports additional training places on the employment training programme. Of the various types of expenditure eligible for funding a small proportion is claimed for trainee allowances, which are over and above benefit entitlement.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what response he intends to make to the resolution sent to him by 40 voluntary member organisations in Scotland protesting about his administration of ESF funding to voluntary organisations.

Mr. Eggar: I will be responding in due course to the resolution sent by the Scottish Council for Voluntary Organisations.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when he anticipates he will pay money out to voluntary organisations for ESF programmes which started in January 1990.

Mr. Eggar: It is expected that first payments from the European social fund to projects will be available to all applicants during the summer, as has been the case in previous years prior to the reform of the Community's structural funds. The timing will however depend in large part on when the European Commission gives approval to operational programmes.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much money has been allocated by him to voluntary organisations for the ESF programme starting in January 1990.

Mr. Eggar: No decisions have been taken yet on the amounts of ESF to be allocated to any organisation in 1990.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many voluntary organisations withdrawing from training work have given reasons for their withdrawal; and in how many cases the way the ESF funding is administered by his Department has been mentioned.

Mr. Eggar: I have no means of being able to establish comprehensive information about the numbers of voluntary organisations withdrawing from training work nor the reasons why. Any information which is available can only be extracted at a disproportionate cost and relates only to Government training schemes.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his policy to guarantee to approve the training programmes of those voluntary organisations who have operated on the assumption that they will receive ESF money for programmes starting in January 1990.

Mr. Eggar: No guarantee of funding can be offered to individual applicants in advance of the approval by the European Commission of operational programmes and decisions about the eligibility of individual projects. No such guarantees have been given in previous years. Once projects are approved, however, expenditure from 1 January 1990 will be eligible for support.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many training places were provided by Scottish voluntary organisations supported by ESF funding in 1989.

Mr. Eggar: In 1989, ESF assistance was approved for Scottish voluntary sector organisations to provide 3,272 training places. I cannot say how many of these places were taken up as the final claims for payment from all these organisations have yet to be received.

Training Projects, Lambeth

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are (a) the total number of trainee places cut for each employment training project in Lambeth, (b) the unit allocation per trainee to each employment training project under the new guidelines in Lambeth and (c) the unit allocation per trainee paid to each employment training project under their previous contracts and the amount claimed by each project in respect of child care and travel costs in the last financial year.

Mr. Nicholls: Information on employment training in respect of (a) is not available. Details of (b) and (c), unit allocations and amounts claimed in respect of child care and travel costs, are confidential to the Training Agency and individual ET training managers.

Training

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment when training matters in England and Wales were brought within the ambit of the Parliamentary Commissioner.

Mr. Eggar: Training programmes in England and Wales run by the Government came within the jurisdiction of the Parliamentary Commissioner for Administration when the office was established in 1967.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make it his policy to inform hon. Members of the amount that is being spent on the mainstream and non-mainstream of the employment training budget.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) on 3 May 1990 at column 639.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether he will make it his practice to inform hon. Members of how much use is being made of day care funding on the employment training scheme.

Mr. Nicholls: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Fife, Central (Mr. McLeish) on 13 February 1990 at column 204.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Mr. Paice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what evidence he has of industry's response, in areas where TECs, are established, to the Government's incentives for financial contributions by companies to TECs.

Mr. Eggar: I have been greatly encouraged by the enthusiastic response that we have had from business leaders to setting up training and enterprise councils. The Government have offered matching funding up to £125,000 in a TEC's first operational year and will provide tax relief on company donations. I am confident that these measures will ensure that TECs are able to attract financial contributions.

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, for employment training, output-related funding for training and enterprise councils, the target percentage of positive outcomes for Great Britain and each standard region in 1990-91 set out by the Training Agency.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 3 May 1990]: The target percentage of positive outcomes for those leaving employment training for Great Britain and each training agency region in 1990-91 is shown in the following table.

	Percentage
South-East	50
London	46
South-West	46
West Midlands	43
East Midlands	45
Yorkshire and Humberside	46
North-West	46
Northern	39
Scotland	41
Wales	47
Great Britain	44

Benefit Claimants

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what powers unemployment benefit officers have to suspend claimants' unemployment benefit and/or income support once an employment service councellor has raised doubts about the claimant (i) being available, (ii) actively seeking work or, (iii) the claimant is suspected of voluntary unemployment, prior to the decision of an adjudication officer.

Mr. Eggar: Employment service officials have the power to make arrangements for payment only where there is no doubt about entitlement. Where doubts arise, they must refer the matter to an independent adjudication officer for a decision on whether unemployment benefit should be paid. Pending the adjudication officer's decision, it would be wrong to pay benefit if entitlement is in doubt. The only exception concerns cases where doubts arise about the availability for work of claimants already being paid unemployment benefit; regulations provide specifically for payment to continue under those circumstances. Entitlement to income support is a matter for the Department of Social Security.

WALES

National Curriculum (Pupil Testing)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the testing and assessment of children in Wales concerning the national curriculum.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: The Secretary of State for Education and Science and the Secretary of State for Wales wrote to the Chairman of the School Examinations and Assessment Council on 6 March and 9 April setting out the Government's views on the arrangements for assessing pupils at age seven, 11 and 14. Copies of this correspondence are available in the Library of the House.

At age 16, the main instrument of assessment will be the GCSE. Decisions on the arrangements to assess music, art and physical education will be made at a later date.

Private Schools

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what amount was paid in grants by his Department to each of the private schools in Wales in each year since 1979.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: Payments made to independent schools for fee remissions under the assisted places scheme are set out in the following table A. The scheme did not commence until 1981-82. In addition, the Department has paid grant under the direct grant scheme as set out in table B.

Mr. Wyn Roberts: At the end of March 1990 there were 22,665 young people participating in the youth training scheme in Wales.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, what was (a) the total civilian work force in employment in Wales, (b) the number of people employed in more than one job and (c) the number on Government-funded work-related training schemes for the years 1979-89.

Mr. David Hunt: The information requested is given in the following table:

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many job clubs there are in Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: There are currently 62 job clubs in Wales.

Welsh Office Financial Management

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether any further payments were made to the contractor responsible for the August 1986 contract to install in his Department a computerised management information system following the £1 million payment referred to in paragraph 3.25 of the National Audit Office report on the Welsh Office: Financial Management.

Mr. David Hunt: A payment was made to the contractor in January 1990 following delivery, installation, testing and acceptance of the finance systems which were the final component of the contract with the Welsh Office.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales for how long the period of dual running of the manual and computerised financial management information systems persisted prior to the introduction on 1 April of the operational management system; and whether the manual financial information system has now ended.

Mr. David Hunt: The new computerised financial information system was comprehensively tested between November 1989 and March 1990. During this period, its output was compared and reconciled with the partially computerised system which has now been superseded.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether any further contractor was brought in to complete the contract originally awarded in August 1986 to install a computerised management information system into his Department referred to in paragrapn 3.24 of the NAO report, Welsh Office: Financial Management.

Mr. David Hunt: No further contractors were brought in to complete the contract referred to in the question.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement concerning the name, address and other details of the contractor submitting the lowest tender to computerise his Department's management information system in August 1986 referred to in paragraph 3.24 of the NAO report, Welsh Office: Financial Management.

Mr. David Hunt: The company concerned was IBM United Kingdom Ltd., whose address is PO Box 41, Portsmouth.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the cost impact of the delay in the installation of a computerised management information system to his Department.

Mr. David Hunt: The financial consequences of the delay in the installation of a computerised management information system were taken fully into account during negotiations with the contractor and were reflected in the settlement which was agreed with my Department. The details of that settlement are in confidence for commercial reasons.

Welsh Office, Cardiff (Security)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) when he anticipates completion of the high-security entrance porch to his Department's Crown building at Cathays park, Cardiff;

(2) what is the estimated cost of the new high-security entrance porch to his Department's Crown building at Cathays park, Cardiff.

Mr. David Hunt: The Cabinet Office has advised a number of Government Departments, including the Welsh Office, on the security necessary to protect Government employees and property. It was recommended that the new Cathays park building of the Welsh Office, which is occupied by 2,000 members of staff of the Welsh Office and the Export Credits Guarantee Department, should have installed an electronic access control system. The installation is underway and I am informed that the anticipated cost will be £594,000 plus VAT, which will be met by Property Holdings (DoE).

The hon. Member has suggested in public statements that this security expenditure is being made to protect Ministers from public demonstrations, but I am sure that he will be aware that Welsh Office Ministers are located in the old Cathays park building, not the new one. Normally, such demonstrations as there are take place outside the old building, to which none of this expenditure relates.

I am informed by Property Holdings (DoE) that the completion date of these security works will be July 1990.

Health Service

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what is the name and full title of the new general manager of the Clwyd family health services authority;

(2) if he will list the names of the new family health services authorities in Wales.

Mr. Grist: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given to the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) on 22 January 1990, at column 512. Family health services authorities will come into being later this year following passage of the National Health Service and Community Care Bill currently before the House and will replace the existing network of family practitioner committees.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what was the salary scale of the administrator of the Clwyd family practitioner committee;

(2) what is the salary scale of the general manager of the Clwyd family health services authority.

Mr. Grist: The current salary scale of the administrator of Clwyd family practitioner committee is as follows:

£22,404
£23,301
£24,233
£25,202
£26,210
£27,258

The flat rate salary of the general manager of Clwyd family practitioner committee is £31,750.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many female administrators of family practitioner committees in Wales there were in 1988.

Mr. Grist: One.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the current position in the Clwyd family health services authority of Mrs. Jennifer Jackson, formerly administrator of Clwyd family practitioner committee.

Mr. Grist: This is a matter for the family practitioner committee as the employing authority.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many female general managers of family health services authorities there are in Wales.

Mr. Grist: No female general managers were selected during the recent recruitment exercise.

Medical Research

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimate he has made of the effects on medical research in Wales of the proposal to create the post of chief of research and development.

Mr. Grist: The White Paper "Priorities in Medical Research" (Command 902) identified the need for a full review of the arrangements for managing and funding medical research in Wales in parallel with developments in England. This review is currently in progress.

Eye Tests

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how cases of glaucoma were recorded in each of the years 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989 in Wales;

(2) how many cases of glaucoma diagnosis were recorded in each of the years (a) 1986, (b) 1987, (c) 1988 and (d) 1989 in South Glamorgan health authority area.

Mr. Grist: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many eye tests were carried out in the six months from (a) 1 April 1986, (b) 1 April 1987, (c) 1 April 1988 and (d) 1 April 1989 in South Glamorgan;

(2) how many eye tests were carried out in the six months from (a) 1 April 1986, (b) 1 April 1987, (c) 1 April 1988 and (d) 1 April 1989 in Wales.

Mr. Grist: Since April 1989, many sight tests will have been private transactions, and statistical information on these is not available centrally. The Government have commissioned a survey of sight tests to cover the first quarter of 1990. The report on the survey results will be placed in the Library of the House of Commons, some time in the early summer.

The available information, which relates to eye tests paid for by family practitioner committees, is given in the following table:

Parliamentary Answers (Cost)

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the cost of the reply given to the question by the hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) on 1 May seeking a list of achievements during his period of office as Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. David Hunt: The cost was £169, including an estimated £44 for printing in Hansard.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Nuclear Technology

Dr. Thomas: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to introduce legislation along the lines of the United States Export Administration Regulations, part 778, concerning the special control of nuclear technology.

Mr. Redwood: The Government have no plans to introduce new legislation to control the export of nuclear-related goods and technology. The United Kingdom's obligations under the nuclear non-proliferation treaty are given effect through the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1989 (SI 1989 No. 2376), as amended, under which a licence is required to export sensitive nuclear-related goods and technology. It is not our practice to license exports which give rise to proliferation or other concerns.

Auditors

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the information that his Department collects about auditors and audit reports.

Mr. Redwood: My Department obtains copies of the lists of members published by the bodies recognised under section 389 of the Companies Act 1985, supplementing the information as necessary by consulting the body concerned. The Department also maintains a record of auditors who have been individually authorised by the Board of Trade or the Secretary of State. Audit reports delivered to the registrar of companies with company accounts are made available by Companies house for public inspection. In addition, my Department collects information about auditors and audits from a wide variety of sources, including the investigation of complaints, press reports, research studies, and contacts with the profession and users of accounts.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will take steps to ensure that the organisations seeking recognition as qualifying bodies under the Companies Act 1989 are required to have student observers on their councils.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will announce the date by which any member of the public may object to the granting of supervisory status to any accountancy body.

Mr. Redwood: This will depend on when the supervisory body applies for recognition under part II of the Companies Act 1989, and how long it takes to determine the application, but I would expect the consideration of a body's application to take several months, which should give members of the public ample opportunity to make representations.

Mr. Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the steps he is taking to reduce the influence in auditing policy-making bodies of accountancy firms criticised by the Department of Trade and Industry and the joint disciplinary scheme.

Mr. Redwood: If, as I assume, the hon. Member has in mind the Auditing Practices Committee, I refer him to the answers I gave to his questions on 27 November at columns 92-93, 18 December at columns 22-23, 21 December at columns 392-93, and 10 January at columns 634-35, when I explained that membership of that committee is a matter for the Consultative Committee of Accountancy Bodies.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the membership of the United Kingdom accountancy bodies incorporated by royal charters.

Mr. Redwood: Details of members are published by the chartered bodies of accountants, from whom up-to-date membership numbers are freely available on application.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will create a single independent organisation to regulate both accounting and auditing standards.

Mr. Redwood: No. The Government's attitude to this proposition has not changed since it was debated during the Committee stage of the Companies Bill last year.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the steps his Department is taking to bridge the expectation gap in auditing.

Mr. Redwood: In so far as the public expects auditors to safeguard their interests, the Government's legislation on the financial services sector (including insurance and banking) has already removed an obstacle which was seen as inhibiting auditors from reporting direct to the various regulatory authorities information relevant to the functions of those authorities. The forthcoming implementation of part II of the Companies Act 1989 will introduce a new regulatory regime for auditors which will help to underpin the quality of auditing.

It is, however, primarily a matter for the auditing profession to consider how to respond to the public's expectations, and my Department welcomes and supports the relevant initiatives which the profession has taken (for example, its guidance on dealing with fraud) and is developing. It is equally incumbent on the public to inform itself of what auditors can and should reasonably expect to accomplish.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) whether he will take steps to ensure that all auditing firms auditing large companies would be required to participate in peer reviews;

(2) whether he will make it his policy to deny supervisory body status to any organisation under the Companies Act 1989 unless it offers arrangements for peer reviews.

Mr. Redwood: Under the Companies Act 1989, the Secretary of State may recognise a supervisory body only if, among other things, the body apears to him to have adequate arrangements and resources for the effective monitoring and enforcement of compliance with its rules. It will be for each supervisory body to set out the precise arrangements and resources through which it proposes to meet this criterion.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether, under the Companies Act 1989, he will refuse to grant supervisory status to any accountancy body which has continued to nominate individuals from the accountancy firms sued by the Government for negligence, criticised by the Department of Trade and Industry and the joint disciplinary scheme on audit policy-making organisations.

Mr. Redwood: No applications for recognition from supervisory bodies have yet been made. When applications are received they will be considered on their merits and in the light of the requirements laid down in part II of the Act, including the requirement that a recognised supervisory body must be able and willing to promote and maintain high standards of integrity in the conduct of company audit work.

Supervisory Bodies

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will introduce legislation to require any organisation seeking recognition as a supervisory body to ensure that the membership of its major policy-making committees is elected.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Language Training

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what talks have been undertaken with the chambers of commerce and related commercial interests on the training of business men in oriental and African languages.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend and I believe it is important for business men to be able to communicate in the languages used by their customers. We have therefore encouraged business men to learn appropriate foreign languages, including oriental languages and those spoken in Africa. We would be happy to discuss the subject with representatives of chambers of commerce or other business organisations, if they wished to do so.

Also, my noble Friend the former Secretary of State for Trade and Industry, Lord Young, announced on 2 March 1989, a Japanese language training initiative. Financial support from my Department and the private sector is currently being given to four universities with the aim of doubling the number of graduates who have Japanese language ability allied to a commercially relevant skill.

An important initiative aimed at business men has been the establishment of the network of language-export (LX) centres, which have received pump-priming funding from the Department of Education and Science under the PICKUP programme. LX centres provide language courses tailormade to meet the needs of business men.

Alexander Howden Group

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he will list the reasons for his decision not to publish the inspector's report on Alexander Howden Group plc which was completed on 26 June 1987.

Mr. Redwood: I have come to no such decision. The question of whether the inspectors' report into the affairs of Alexander Howden Group plc should be published is under consideration following the conclusion of criminal proceedings in relation to that company.

Product Safety

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what discussions he has had with trading standards officers on product safety.

Mr. Forth: I have met trading standards officers and members of their representative organisations on several occasions at which product safety was one of the issues discussed. Officials of my Department keep in regular contact with trading standards officers.

Accounting Standards Board

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how the priorities of the Accounting Standards Board will be determined.

Mr. Redwood: This is a matter which the Financial Reporting Council and the proposed Accounting Standards Board will need to consider.

Investment Services

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what representations he has made to the European Commission and the Council of Ministers on the EC investment services draft directive; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: My Department made a number of representations to the European Commission before its formal proposal for an investment services directive was submitted to the Council, and continues to press the United Kingdom interest in achieving an effective, liberalising directive in subsequent discussions in the Council working group. The directive has not yet been discussed at ministerial level in the Council.

Accounting Standards Board

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps have been taken to ensure that the Accounting Standards Board is not dominated by the professional associations in accountancy; and whether he proposes to refer this matter to the Office of Fair Trading.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he has taken to ensure that the employing organisations of members of the Accounting Standards Board do not exercise influence over its proceedings; and whether he proposes to refer this matter to the Office of Fair Trading.

Mr. Redwood: None. These are matters which the Financial Reporting Council and the proposed Accounting Standards Board will not doubt consider. At this stage, therefore, no question of reference to the Director General of Fair Trading arises.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether he proposes to seek views on the membership of the Accounting Standards Board from (a) the Equal Opportunities Commission and (b) the Race Relations Commission.

Mr. Redwood: No.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will list the criticisms of the firm of the chairman-designate of the Accounting Standards Board by Department of Trade and Industry inspectors.

Mr. Redwood: As far as I am aware, no firm of which the chairman-designate of the Accounting Standards Board was a partner at the time has been criticised in reports of inspectors.

Financial Advice Services

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how much money was provided in grant aid for money advice services and debt counselling services (a) from his own Department and other Government sources and (b) from private sector sources in each of the financial years 1983-84 to 1989-90.

Mr. Forth: My Department does not provide funds specifically or directly for money advice and debt counselling services. However, my Department does fund the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux (NACAB) and Citizens Advice Scotland (CAS) to enable them to support local bureaux, who provide money advice and debt counselling services. Total grant-in-aid paid by my Department to NACAB and CAS during the last seven years is as follows. I am not able to five figures for private sector funding of money advice, nor am I able to provide figures for other Government Departments.

Year	NACAB and CAS £
1983-84	6,041,000
1984-85	7,093,617
1985-86	7,993,445
1986-87	8,604,088
1987-88	8,954,000
1988-89	9,404,962
1989-90	10,044,071

Aircraft Industry

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he is taking to ensure that the United Kingdom aircraft industry is in a competitive position in respect of high speed propeller technology.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I am pleased to announce that the Department has awared a grant of £3·146 million for a major project to research into the problems associated with the design and operation of civil aircraft powered with advanced high-speed propeller (or open rotor) propulsion systems.

In line with current Government policy the project is collaborative; British Aerospace (Commercial Aircraft) Ltd. and Dowty Aerospace Ltd. are the lead companies, with the Aircraft Research Association as a major sub-contractor.

The overall objective of the project is to ensure that United Kingdom firms are ready to embody into new civil aircraft projects these radically different power plants in the event that they become a viable alternative to conventional turbojet engines. The considerably lower fuel consumption (around 20 per cent.-30 per cent. less) of the open rotor could, after allowing for higher initial cost and maintenance costs, save some 5 per cent. to 10 per cent. on aircraft direct operating costs, depending on movements in fuel costs. The reduced fuel consumption could also give environmental benefits from reduced exhaust emissions.

Most of the early work has been done in the United States of America, and has been largely concerned with power plants mounted on the rear fuselage. The present project will consider wing-mounted open rotors which are likely to be chosen for aircraft in the 80-to-100—seat category, a market in which the United Kingdom and Europe have been relatively successful.

Iraq (Arms Component Exports)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on the progress of inquiries by his Department into contacts between the hon. Member for Bromsgrove and his Department on behalf of Walter Somers Ltd. over export orders for Iraq.

Mr. Ridley: In the light of the criminal charges laid against individuals, and in the light of the continuing investigations by Customs and Excise, it would be inappropriate to give any further information on these matters.

Waste Paper

Mr. Crowther: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the impact of state-subsidised imports of waste paper from North America on the United Kingdom waste paper market; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: It is not possible separately to identify the volumes of waste paper imports derived from mandatory collection schemes in North America, whether subsidised or not. However, the following information is available: during 1989, the United Kingdom imported 80,357 tonnes of waste paper; 23,069 tonnes of which came from the United States of America and Canada. In the same year, the United Kingdom exported 479,385 tonnes.

In the period up until the end of March this year, the United Kingdom imported 19,665 tonnes of waste paper (including 8,676 tonnes from the United States of America and Canada) and exported around 114,000 tonnes.

Matrix-Churchill Plant

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what steps he took to satisfy himself that the die-forging plant to be built by Matrix-Churchill would not be used in producing parts for ballistic missiles or the supergun project Babylon before he issued an export licence.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 30 April 1990]: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to comment on individual licensing matters. Exports for Iran and Iraq are subject to the ministerial guidelines on defence sales announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in the House on 29 October 1985.

600 Services

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what consideration was given to the site at which, and the purposes for which, the lathes produced by 600 Services of Colchester for al-Hillal were to be used before he issued an export licence.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 30 April 1990]: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to comment on individual licensing matters. Exports for Iran and Iraq are subject to the ministerial guidelines on defence sales announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in the House on 29 October 1985.

Financial Services Act

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry which areas have been granted designated territory status under the Financial Services Act 1986; on what dates and after satisfying which criteria; how many firms from each designated territory have now become members of self-regulatory organisations; how many members of each self-regulatory organisations are drawn from areas with designated territory status; and whether self-regulatory organisations have refused membership to any firms from designated territories.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 3 May 1990]: The countries and territories designated by order under section 87 of the Financial Services Act in respect of specified classes of collective investment schemes are: the Isle of Man (12 December 1988); the Bailiwick of Guernsey (30 December 1988); the Bailiwick of Jersey (30 December 1988); Bermuda (19 January 1989). The criteria applied are those set down in section 87(2) of the Act.

The countries and territories designated by order under section 130 of the Act in respect of certain insurance business are: the Bailiwick of Guernsey (5 April 1988); the Isle of Man (5 April 1988); the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania (1 February 1990). The criteria applied are those set down in section 130(4) of the Act.

Questions concerning membership of the self-regulatory organisations are matters for the particular bodies concerned.

Scientific Equipment

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what the estimated level of investment in scientific equipment was, both in total and per capita, during the years 1985 to 1989; and what comparable figures he has for other OECD countries.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 3 May 1990]: The information is not available in the form requested.

Deregulation Unit

Mr. Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he has completed his review of the work of the deregulation unit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ridley [holding answer 3 May 1990]: The review foreshadowed in the White Paper on "Releasing Enterprise" (Cm. 512, November 1988) is being completed, but it is too soon to make a statement.

SCOTLAND

Wetlands

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow on 18 April, Official Report, column 930, how many of the estuarine sites of special scientific interest which have been listed for possible designation under the EC directive on the conservation of wild birds are national nature reserves; shellfish harvesting is controlled through byelaws; which local authorities have made byelaws to control access to the foreshore; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The area of a national nature reserve may not always extend to the whole area of a site of special scientific interest. Of the 11 estuarine sites covered by the EC directive, four contain national nature reserves. The information requested about byelaws is not available.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow on 18 April, Official Report, column 930, what proposals he has considered to control or prohibit damaging operations below low-water mark for the purposes of meeting Her Majesty's Government's obligations under the Ramsar convention on the conservation of wetlands of international importance and under the EC directive on the conservation of wild birds; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Damaging operations below the low water mark in any area, whether or not designated under the Ramsar convention or the EC directive on the conservation of wild birds, can be controlled or prohibited through byelaws under section 37 and schedule 12 of the Wildlife and Countryside Act 1981 after designation as a marine nature reserve. It is for the Nature Conservancy Council to propose suitable areas for designation to the Secretary of State under section 36 of the 1981 Act.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow on 18 April, Official Report, column 930, what information he has on the mechanical harvesting of inter-tidal organisms, such as cockles, on sites of special scientific interest; and where this harvesting is being undertaken by persons who are owners or occupiers of the sites, what steps he proposes to take in order to fulfil Her Majesty's Government's obligations under the Ramsar convention on the conservation of wetlands of international importance and under the EC directive on the conservation of wild birds; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Nature Conservancy Council has informed me of mechanical shellfish harvesting on various inter-tidal areas of the upper Solway flats and marshes site of special scientific interest. I await the council's views and advice once it has considered the recently completed research report on the impact of cockling. At common law, the public have a right to take small shellfish including cockles from the foreshore. Access to the foreshore for mechanical vehicles may be controlled by byelaws and I have encouraged the council to consider how such control might be applied.

Feudal Superiors

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he intends to legislate to abolish the powers of feudal superiors in Scotland to attach conditions to the use of land.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Law Commission is considering land tenure law reform with a view to completion of the reform of feudal tenure. Its report will provide a basis for considering what legislation will be appropriate.

Training

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) whether he will make it his practice to make information on (a) the undertakings given by local enterprise companies about training, (b) expenditure per head on YT and ET programmes and (c) the amount to be spent in various training agencies in Scottish Enterprise areas, available on request to hon. Members;

(2) what information about training that is currently available he will cease to make available to hon. Members when Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise are operational.

Mr. Lang: Final decisions have yet to be taken on the range of information about training programmes which local enterprise companies will be required to collect. When these decisions have been taken I shall write to the hon. Member with a detailed list of information which will be collected centrally. My right hon. and learned Friend will make such information available to hon. Members provided that it is not commercial in confidence or personal information about individual trainees.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether when the Training Agency has re-negotiated employment training and youth training contracts, he will inform hon. Members of the results of those renegotiations.

Mr. Lang: When the current recontracting exercise has been completed I will be glad to provide general information about the outcome for hon. Members. However details of individual contracts remain commercial in confidence and will not be made available.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make it his practice to make information on (a) the amount of unused capacity on ET and YT schemes, (b) the extent to which expenditure on ET and YT schemes in Scotland exceeded budgets and (c) the steps taken to investigate complaints about the workings of YT and ET schemes, available on request to hon. Members.

Mr. Lang: Information on the investigation of complaints about employment training and youth training will be made available so far as this does not involve matters which must be considered to be commercial in confidence or personal information about individual traineess.

I do not provide information on matters relevant to the contracts with individual training providers. Information about unfilled places on both employment training and youth training is currently available for Scotland and for each Training Agency area office. Information about expenditure on these programmes is already available for Scotland.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will detail the type of information about employment training and youth training schemes which he is (a) prepared and (b) not prepared to give to hon. Members.

Mr. Lang: I am always ready to supply to hon. Members any reliable information about employment training and youth training schemes which is collected by the Training Agency provided that information is not commercial in confidence or personal information about individual trainees.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make it his practice to inform an hon. Member of the number of employment training and youth training places being offered by particular firms or organisations.

Mr. Lang: Information about the employment training and youth training places offered by particular placement providers is and will remain commercial in confidence.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether he will make it his practice to make information on (a) the number of places being offered on YT and ET schemes in particular skills, (b) the number of places for trainees with special needs being offered on YT and ET and by which organisations and (c) the instructions being given to Training Agency staff on the principles by which they negotiate training contracts with training agents and training managers available on request to hon. Members.

Mr. Lang: I am happy to provide hon. Members with details of any general instructions issued to Training Agency staff on the principles by which they negotiate training contracts where such general instructions exist. However, the new flexibilities introduced for youth training and employment training mean that the basis on which training contracts are negotiated will vary from contract to contract as dictated by local circumstances.

I do not provide information on matters relevant to contracts with individual training providers. General information about numbers of people in training by occupational categories and on trainees with special needs is not currently available because the Training Agency is presently modifying the computer systems used to collect training data.

Fast Transport

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last discussed the need for fast passenger and freight transport to the continent from Scotland after 1 January 1993 with representatives of the (a) Scottish business community and (b) British Rail.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: On a number of recent occasions my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister of State have discussed with the Scottish business community the provision of through passenger and freight services to the continent through the channel tunnel, and they have urged all Scottish businesses to make known now, to assist British Rail's planning, the full extent of the services to Europe they expect to require when the tunnel opens.

As part of our regular and useful contacts with British Rail, my right hon. and learned Friend and I discussed links to the channel tunnel and various other topics relating to rail transport when we met the former chairman of British Rail, Sir Robert Reid, and the former general manager of ScotRail, Mr. John Ellis, on 31 October 1989.

A1 (Improvement)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make an early announcement of the date of commencement of the construction of the Tower to Dunglass improvement scheme on the A1.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am pleased to be able to inform the hon. Member that the Scottish Development Department will be issuing tender documents for the scheme later this month. I can assure the hon. Member that we will start this important improvement at the earliest possible date thereafter and I anticipate that the start to construction will be made in late summer.

Foreign Language Training

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what special financial incentives Her Majesty's Government are giving to Scottish students in order to increase their training in foreign languages.

Mr. Lang: Financial incentives are not offered specifically to encourage students to undertake language courses, but the normal student support arrangements apply to a wide range of language courses and to courses which include a language together with another subject.

In addition, Scottish domiciled students wishing to undertake part of their course abroad, with the associated foreign language training, may participate in the European Community action scheme for the mobility of university students (ERASMUS). This programme provides specialist assistance for that purpose, in addition to the general assistance available under the students' allowances scheme.

Lothian and Greater Glasgow Health Boards

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement regarding the financial situation of the Lothian and Greater Glasgow health boards.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Lothian health board has allowed commitments to exceed its income and has been asked to bring forward proposals to bring its expenditure and income into balance. Management consultants are helping the board to assess the scale of the deficit, and are advising on ways to provide their existing services more efficiently. The management team's report and recommendations on these crucial matters is not yet complete and I understand that it is to be presented at the next meeting of the board on 24 May.

Only at that stage will the board be able to assess whether changes to the present pattern of service will be required.

In common with the remaining health boards, Greater Glasgow health board is operating within the budget allocated through the Scottish health authorities revenue equalisation (SHARE) process.

Health Service Funding

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the (i) capital, (ii) revenue and (iii) total allocation made to the health boards in Scotland in each of the last five years and in the last financial year.

HEALTH

Consultants

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, further to the answer to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North, of 25 April, what criteria were not met by each of the nine unsuccessful bids for consultant posts made by north Staffordshire district health authority under the 100 consultants scheme.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The criteria for this scheme were set out in my reply to the hon. Member for Stoke-on-Trent, North on 25 April at columns 216-17.

We received about 250 bids for the 100 available posts, and a large number of these bids met the criteria, they were assessed within each specialty according to the extent to which they would reduce long waiting lists and times.

In assessing North Staffordshire's need for the limited number of posts available, we took account of the applications for the West Midlands region as a whole and consulted Inter-Authority Comparisons and Consultancy (IACC), which is examining this district's waiting lists as part of the waiting list initiative.

North Staffordshire's bid for a consultant gynaecologist was successful. We were unable to give priority to the district's other bids for the following reasons:

Gastroenterology, Rheumatology, Urology	Few or no in-patients waiting more than one year for treatment.
General surgery, Orthopaedics	IACC is examining waiting lists for these specialties, and advised that the appointment of a new consultant was not a high priority compared with other districts.
Ophthalmology, ENT	Relatively small impact predicted on waiting lists compared with other districts and specialties.
Audiological medicines	Consultant would work in out-patient and Community clinics and hence have no impact on in-patient waiting lists.

Last year north Staffordshire received £92,000 from the sum reserved from the waiting list fund for districts with particular waiting problems. This sum was earmarked for the T&O, ophthalmology, ENT and gynaecology specialties. This enabled an additional 950 patients to be treated from the waiting lists. The district's waiting lists are being examined again this year, and it may qualify for a further allocation from the £12 million set aside for the longest lists.

Mental Health Tribunals

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average delay between a detained patient's request for a mental health review tribunal under sections of the Mental Health Act, other than section 2, and the holding of the tribunal.

Mr. Dorrell: In relation to tribunals held during the first quarter of 1990, patients subject to restriction orders had waited on average 26·5 weeks for a tribunal hearing while patients not subject to restriction orders had waited an average of 12 weeks. There are a number of factors which influence the length of time taken to mount tribunals. These include the time taken to obtain medical and social services reports, and medical second opinions when the patient or the patient's solicitor considers these would be helpful. Officials have been asked to carry out an urgent review of the methods and procedures involved to identify any scope for improvements.

Helicopters

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Livingston (Mr. Cook) of 8 February, Official Report, column 764, if he will list by regional health authority (a) how many helicopters are currently in service in the ambulance service and (b) what is their annual upkeep cost, including air and maintenance crews.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) on 23 January at columns 656-57. No information is available centrally on the annual operating costs of helicopter ambulances in use in the NHS.

Head Lice

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 26 April, Official Report, columns 293-94, (1) what advice is available to local education authorities which would assist them further to reduce the incidence of head lice;

(2) what advice is available to health authorities which would assist them further to reduce the incidence of head lice.

Mr. Dorrell: The Health Education Authority has published guidance including a booklet, "What to do about Head Lice", copies of which have been placed in the Library, which is widely available to both health and local education authorities, as well as to the general public. Pharmaceutical companies also publish information on the use of their products in the treatment and prevention of head lice infestation.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 26 April, Official Report, columns 293-94, about head lice, if certain geographical areas are more affected than others.

Mr. Dorrell: The table shows the number of infestations with vermin among children aged five to 14 in each of the regional health authorities for 1987-88.

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Health pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth of 26 April, Official Report, columns 293-94, about head lice, if the incidence of infection is greater among primary or secondary pupils.

Mr. Dorrell: Data on incidence of the conditions listed in the reply of my hon. Friend the Member for Kettering (Mr. Freeman) on 26 April at columns 293-94 is held centrally only for the age group 5-14.

Medicines Control Agency

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on (a) the present and (b) the expected future relationship between his Department and the medicines control agency; and what staff have been seconded to the agency from his Department.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Medicines Control Agency (MCA) is an agency within the Department of Health (DH). It took over the functions and staff (medical, pharmaceutical, and administrative) of the former medicines division of DH. A single director was appointed, after advertisement and competition, from outside the civil service. The director is reorganising MCA in pursuit of greater effectiveness and efficiency in decisions about the licensing of medicines. The present priority is to implement and exploit these changes. Further change would be considered in the light of experience of the operation of the new organisation.

Biotechnology

Mr. Ted Garrett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the improvements in health care arising from the developments in biotechnology.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Advances in biotechnology have made available novel or improved treatments for a wide range of diseases. It is now possible to produce a number of therapeutic compounds in large quantities that were hitherto very difficult to obtain. The following list, which is by no means exhaustive, gives an indication of biotechnology-derived products already on the market; human insulin for the treatment of diabetes; vaccines for hepatitis B; human growth hormone for the treatment of dwarfism; and alpha-interferon for the treatment of, for example, certain leukaemias.

Other improvements in health care include the development of more rapid, sensitive tests for the diagnosis of a wide variety of microbial diseases. Also, there are increasing applications in the area of clinical genetics for the greater precision that is now possible in the detection of those at risk from genetic diseases. In addition, we now have a real prospect of providing treatment for certain of the inherited diseases, although this is still some time away.

RHA Newspapers

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total annual cost of "Health View", the newspaper of the Yorkshire regional health authority.

Mr. Dorrell: This is a matter for the regional health authority. The hon. Member may like to contact Sir Bryan Askew, chairman of Yorkshire regional health authority for further information.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance is given by his Department to regional health authorities regarding the publication of information sheets or newspapers.

Mr. Dorrell: All health authorities are expected to keep their local populations informed of service achievements, developments and proposals for change. How they do this is a matter for them.

Income Support

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the benefits for which he is responsible which are provided free for families whose head of the household is receiving income support.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Income support families can obtain the following benefits for which the Department is responsible provided they satisfy any additional qualifying conditions:

Free prescriptions
Free dental treatment
Free sight tests
Full-value vouchers for glasses
All hospital travel costs
Free wigs and fabric supports
Free milk and vitamins
Help from the family fund

Birth Control

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will review the provision of contraceptive services for teenagers; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department asks health authorities, in organising contraceptive services for young people, to consider separate, less formal arrangements than those for older age groups, with staff experienced in dealing with young people and their problems. However, the level of such provision is a matter for individual health authorities to determine in the light of local needs and priorities. A number of health authorities provide services for young people through Brook advisory centres. On 4 April I announced increased central support for Brook of £65,000 per annum.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will list the voluntary organisations funded by the Department of Health involved in (a) family planning and (b) abortion;

(2) if he will specify the amount spent by his Department on voluntary organisations involved in family planning and abortion in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department provides funding towards the headquarters administrative costs of the following voluntary organisations involved in family planning:

Family Planning Association
Brook Advisory Centres
Catholic Marriage Advisory Council
SPOD (The Association to Aid the Sexual and Personal Relationships of People with a Disability)

The amount given in section 64 core grant funding to these organisations in total, in each of the last five years, is as follows:

1986-87	222,250
1987-88	248,500
1988-89	248,500
1989-90	251,000
1990-91	308,200

A further £64,550 has been given in additional grants for one-off projects and capital equipment.

Grants are not provided to voluntary organisations involved in abortions.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the availability in the National Health Service of male and female sterilisation for non-medical reasons.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Health Authorities are asked to make both male and female sterilisation operations available as an NHS service both for medical reasons and on family planning grounds, and to ensure that persons with a priority need for the operation are enabled to receive it quickly. The priority which can be given to these operations generally is a matter for clinical judgment and local decision.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will mount a public information campaign on availability of family planning services.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Guidance issued by this Department to health authorities stresses the importance of widespread publicity about the availability of family planning services and gives advice on the type of information that should be provided and the various publicity methods that may be used.

The Family Planning Information Service, which receives substantial Government funding through the HEA, produces a series of leaflets, available to the public, about the various methods of contraception. These leaflets also contain information about how to find a family planning doctor or clinic.

In addition, family practitioner committees and general practitioners themselves are required to publish, and make available to the public, information about whether individual general practitioners provide contraceptive services.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will estimate the number of doctors currently in general practice who (a) hold and (b) do not hold qualifications issued by the joint committee on Contraception.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information is not held centrally. Advice from the joint committee on contraception indicates that up to 14 March 1990 a total of 27,077 certificates have been issued to doctors in the United Kingdom. However, within this total, no breakdown is readily available for general practitioners.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the number of unplanned and regretted pregnancies in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information on the number of unplanned and regretted pregnancies is not available.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the training provided for general practitioners both initial and in-service on contraception.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All medical students receive instruction in the principles of human reproduction and family planning.

GP trainees are instructed by their trainers at practice family planning clinics and may also attend theoretical and practical family planning courses provided by health authorities to obtain the family planning certificate. Updating courses on contraception are also provided for established principals by health authorities and medical institutions.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the help available to women to assist them in avoiding unplanned pregnancies.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Free NHS family planning advice and services are available from specialist clinics and from general practitioners. Some 4 million people make use of these services each year. A wide range of information and help on contraception and planned parenthood is also available from voluntary bodies like the Family Planning Association, Brook advisory centres, the Catholic Marriage Advisory Council and the Association to Aid the Sexual and Personal Relationships of People with a Disability, all of which receive a departmental grant. In addition the Family Planning Information Service, which receives financial support from the Government-funded Health Education Authority, also provides information and material to the public, professionals and media on family planning methods and services and related areas of health care.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the change in the availability of family planning clinic services in the last three years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We are aware that a number of health authorities have made or propose to make reductions in the number of sessions offered by their family planning clinics, often as part of a rationalisation of services to make more effective use of available resources. About two thirds of the 4 million people who make use of the NHS family planning services each year go to their GP. The day to day management of health services such as this is a matter for individual authorities since they can best judge local circumstances and needs. However, guidance issued by this Department makes clear that we expect health authorities to strike a balance between services provided by specialist clinics and those provided by GPs.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will state for each regional and district health authority the number of sessions of family planning clinics held in each of the last five years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The number of sessions held in each regional health authority, in the five years up to 1987-88 is shown in the table. Over the same period the number of people seeing GPs for family planing services increased by 8 per cent. Data for 1987-88 are for the financial year, those for earlier years are for the calendar year.

Figures for district health authorities for the five-year period are not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Sex Education

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the provision of sex education.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Subject to the requirements of the National Curriculum, governing bodies are responsible for determining their school's policy on the content and organisation of sex education.

In the wider sphere, the Health Education Authority's strategic plan 1990-95, published last November, announced the extension of the authority's work on AIDS public health education to include the maintenance of good sexual health, with the aims of educating the public and promoting a supportive climate of social opinion, and to support workers and agencies concerned with sexual health. The authority's family and child health programme will continue to provide information on pregnancy, parenting and the care of young children generally. Education for schools on family life and personal responsibility is also promoted through the authority's extensive programme for young people.

Sex education is also a central part of the work of the Family Planning Association and Brook advisory centres.

Foetal Monitoring

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) for approximately what percentage of births there is electronic foetal monitoring;

(2) how many obstetric units routinely use electronic foetal monitors.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Information on the location of monitors or the extent of their use is not collected centrally, but I understand that research studies show that they are in regular use in virtually all NHS maternity units.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what research studies there have been into the benefits of electronic foetal monitors; and what conclusions were reached;

(2) what evidence is available as to whether foetal monitoring has affected (a) perinatal mortality or (b) the percentage of births which require a caesarean section.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that studies have established that electronic foetal monitoring gives a more detailed measurement of foetal heart rate than the intermittent use of foetal stethoscope. Clinical practice on the interpretation of the readings from electronic monitors varies and evidence that they reduce the risk of perinatal mortality is not conclusive. The studies show that the caesarian section rate is up to one third higher where there has been electronic foetal monitoring, but the incidence is lower if there is complementary monitoring by foetal scalp blood sampling.

Midwives

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many midwives have been employed by the National Health Service; how many births there have been; and what has been the ratio of births to midwives in the last five years.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The requested information is shown in the table.

NHS midwives in post,[1] total births[1] and ratio of births to midwives —England

[1] All figures are independently rounded to the nearest ten (10). Unrounded figures are used to calculate ratios.

[2] Includes agency staff and students.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many midwife posts are currently vacant in the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This information is not collected centrally.

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if any action is planned to increase the number of midwives in the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is the responsibility of individual health authorities to determine the level of midwives required to run local maternity services, both in hospitals and the community. At 30 September 1988, the latest date for which figures are available, the number of midwives (whole time equivalent) employed in the National Health Service was 19,090, an increase of 3,060 (19·1 per cent.) since 1981.

We are continuing to take steps to improve staffing in this vital area. Rates of pay have increased; in 1988, 9 out of 10 staff midwives were graded E or above under the new clinical grading structure and receive average pay increases on assimilation of 23 per cent. Since 1979 their pay has increased by over 50 per cent. in real terms.

We are proposing an increase in the numbers of those undertaking three-year pre-registration training and in the advance diploma in midwifery by distance learning.

Eye Tests

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list in the Official Report the number of NHS eye tests carried out between 1 April and 30 September 1989.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The number of NHS sight tests paid for by FPCs and health boards between 1 April 1989 and 31 September 1989 was as follows:

	Million
England	3·380
Wales	0·170
Scotland	0·282
Great Britain	3·832

Of these 1·813 million were conducted before 1 April and 2·018 were conducted after 1 April and paid for before the end of September.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will release the results of the survey commissioned by his Department into the number of eye tests in the first quarter of 1990 compared with previous years; and what allowance will be made when analysing the figures for the £1 million advertising campaign encouraging people to have eye tests.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The results of the survey commissioned by the Department into the number of sight tests in the first quarter of 1990 will be available by the early summer. A summary of the findings will be placed in the Library. No special allowance will be made when analysing the figures for the advertising campaign encouraging people to have sight tests, which took place in the summer and autumn of 1989.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will give a detailed breakdown of how the saving from the imposition of eye test charges has been reallocated to other areas of primary health care;

(2) if the estimated saving to the National Health Service budget arising from the imposition of eye test charges has been reallocated within primary health care as new additional funds on top of last year's budgetary allocations.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The saving from restricting the National Health Service sight-test to certain priority groups with effect from January 1989 was taken into account in setting budget plans for 1989-90 and subsequent years. Estimated total net expenditure on family practitioner services including administration in 1989-90 was £294 million higher than the total spend in 1988-89, an increase of nearly 7 per cent., and is planned to increase further in subsequent years. In budget planning the total available resources are distributed according to service need; savings in one area are not directly earmarked to specific expenditure in another.

Abortion

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement about the availability of abortion services in the National Health Service.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The level of gynaecological provision including abortion, like other provision within the National Health Service, is decided by individual health authorities. The Government believe that such decisions are best taken locally in the light of authorities' first-hand knowledge of local needs and priorities and competing claims on resources.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will give the abortion rate for the last year for which figures are available in the United Kingdom and other EEC countries.

Mr. Dorrell: The abortion rate for Great Britain[2] and other EEC countries for the latest year for which figures are available is shown in the table.

Country	Year	Rate (per 1,000 women aged 15 to 44)
Great Britain	1988	[3]16·0

[1] Provisional.
[2] The 1967 Abortion Act does not apply to Northern Ireland.
[3] Great Britain data was prepared from OPCS sources and the General Registrar Office, Scotland.
[4] Not applicable.

The hon. Member may also be interested in the research report by Jennifer Gunning on "Human IVF, embryo research, foetal tissue for research and treatment, and abortion, International Information", published in February 1990, which provides additional information and is available in the Library.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has on the causes of late abortion; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1988, the latest year for which data are available, there were 22 abortions in England and Wales after 24 weeks gestation. Eighteen of these were carried out on the grounds of suspected serious foetal abnormality whilst the other four were as a result of a serious risk to the pregnant woman should the pregnancy continue having been identified.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many abortions in the last year were carried out on (i) an in-patient and (ii) and out-patient basis.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: In 1988, the latest complete year for which data are available, there were 77,455 abortions carried out where the woman did not stay overnight. A further 105,796 abortions were performed where the duration of stay was one or more nights, (which would include any planned day cases where the woman stayed overnight). There were 547 notifications received on which this information was not recorded.

Porton Down

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Salisbury, Official Report, 19 April, column 990, when he expects to announce the name of the successful bidder for the centre for applied microbiology and research, Porton Down, Wiltshire.

Mr. Dorrell: I have nothing to add to the reply my hon. Friend the then Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State gave my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) on 19 April at column 990.

Hospital Incinerators

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what criteria he lays down for the temperature at which hospital incinerators operate; and whether any analysis of the output of chlorinated dibenzodioxins (dioxins) and dibenzofurans from such incinerators has been made.

Mr. Dorrell: Hospital clinical waste incinerators are required to conform with British Standard 3316—that is, to operate at a temperature of 800°C. The monitoring of flue-gas emissions is a matter for individual health authorities.

New, higher standards for the operation of such incinerators will be introduced following the enactment of the Environmental Protection Bill. These will include new operating temperatures and more stringent flue-gas emission controls.

Erythropoetin

Mr. Speller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Newbury, (Sir M. McNair-Wilson), Official Report, 9 March, column 902, whether any decision has yet been reached on licensing of the drug erythropoetin.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I am not yet able to add to the reply that I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) on 9 March at column 902.

Tinnitus

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to increase the level of funding for research into tinnitus.

Mr. Jackson: I have been asked to reply.

It is for the Medical Research Council (MRC) to decide on the balance of funding for the areas of research within its responsibility. It is currently funding research into tinnitus and, although no major new initiative is planned in this field, the MRC is always willing to consider sound proposals for research which will be considered in competition with other applications.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Local Government Finance

Mr. Maxton: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his reply to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Garscadden (Mr. Dewar) on 18 April, Official Report, column 890, how much the average poll tax in Scotland would be in 1990-91 if the rebate scheme was financed by poll tax payers and not central Government; and if he will give the figure for each district and region in Scotland.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret that it is not possible to answer the hon. Member's question. If the community charge benefit scheme was financed by the authority's charge payers, the community charge level itself would rise and rebates would rise accordingly. This spiral effect should eventually level out but it is not possible to estimate at what point.

Youth Training Scheme

Ms. Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what regulations govern the assessing of the applicable amount for a youth training trainee for community charge purposes.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Many YTS trainees will complete their course before they are 18 and so will not be liable for the personal community charge. Those trainees who are liable to pay the personal community charge may claim community charge benefit. The applicable amount relevant to a claim depends, besides age, upon the claimant's personal circumstances, for example whether or not he or she is married. The applicable amounts are set out in schedule 1 of the Community Charge Benefits (General) Regulations 1989, as uprated by the Social Security Benefits Up-Rating Order 1990.

Retirement Pension

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if there are any proposals to amend the day on which state retirement pensions are paid to the qualifying date rather than the following Monday.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There are no proposals to do so. Under current provisions an individual is entitled to a full weeks pension by the seventh day following the date of their claim. Retirement pension is a regular weekly payment and not payable for part weeks.

Income Support

Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the benefits for which he is responsible which are provided free for families whose head of the household is receiving income support.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Families receiving income support are entitled to maximum help with eligible rent through housing benefit and maximum community charge benefit. They may also get help from the social fund. Such families are also automatically entitled to various other benefits (including exemption from National Health Service charges, free school meals and free welfare milk and vitamins) for which my right hon. Friends in other Departments are responsible.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what powers Department of Social Security officers have to stop or suspend a claimant's income support if notified by an unemployment benefit office that the claimant is suspected of being voluntarily unemployed, but the adjudication officer's decision is still awaited; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Under regulation 22 of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, as amended, an unemployed person claiming income support, whose claim for unemployment benefit has not been determined because a question of disqualification arises for being voluntarily unemployed, is entitled to income support at a reduced rate only. The reduction, which is applied to the claimant's personal rate of benefit, ensures that he does not receive the same benefit as someone who clearly satisfied all the conditions, but at the same time he is not left without financial support while the question is investigated.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what powers Department of Social Security officers have to stop or suspend a claimant's income support if notified by the unemployment benefit office that the claimant's (i) actively seeking work or (ii) availability has been called into question but the adjudication officer's decision is still awaited; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Under section 20 of the Social Security Act 1986, as amended, an unemployed person claiming income support has to be actively seeking employment and available for employment. In specific circumstances he may be treated as fulfilling these conditions. Otherwise, where there is a doubt, normal benefit cannot be paid.

Regulation 8 of the Income Support (General) Regulations 1987, as amended, however, excuses a claimant from these requirements if an adjudication officer is satisfied that he or a member of his family will suffer hardship if income support is not paid. In such a case regulation 22 of the same regulations provides for payment of benefit at a reduced rate.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, if he will provide information as to the proportion of (i) income support and (ii) unemployment benefit claimants successfully claiming reduced income support under the hardship rules following (a) disqualification or (b) disallowance of benefit; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: A claimant disqualified from receipt of unemployment benefit because of voluntary unemployment can receive income support at a reduced rate without needing to show hardship.

From October 1989 to March 1990 there were 1,860 such awards and 733 refusals. These figures are provisional and are subject to amendment.

Family Credit

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many claims and awards of family credit were made in each month since April 1988; and how many claims were outstanding at the end of each month.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information is in the table:

Departmental Advertising

Mr. Patchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the figures for the spending by his Department on (a) newspaper advertising, (b) radio advertising, (c) television advertising, and (d) all other promotional material relating to the community charge proposals (i) since its inception and (ii) in each respective year; what is his latest estimate for the current year; and what is the budget for 1990-91.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There has been no newspaper, radio or television advertising of community charge benefit in the 1988-89 or 1989-90 years by the Department.

The costs of promotional material in 1988-89 was £34,817 and in 1989-90 was £75, 682,

There will be a press campaign publicising the importance of claiming community charge benefit starting on 6 May. The total budget for 1990-91 is £750,000.

Assessment

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are his estimates of the additional costs of assessing individuals separately for (a) community charge benefit, (b) housing benefit and (c) income support.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I regret that it is not possible to provide the hon. Member with the information requested. It is a fundamental principle of the income-related benefit system that married and unmarried partners are assessed together. The wide range of assumptions needed to estimate the additional costs of assessing all individuals separately for all the income related benefits means that any estimates would be both arbitrary and uncertain.

Social Fund

Mr. Terry Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many local Department of Social Security offices in the midlands region received an extra allocation for their social fund grant budget in 1989-90.

Mr. Nicholas Scott: Details of local offices that received additional social fund budget allocations in the financial year 1989-90 were placed in the Library.

Government Actuary (Report)

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the reasons for the delays in the production and publication of the Government Actuary's quinquennial report; when he received the report; and when it will be published.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We have not yet received the Government Actuary's report. We are informed by the Government Actuary that the delay has been due to heavy work demands and recruitment difficulties which have now been resolved. However, we understand that the report is now almost completed and that the Government Actuary expects to submit the report within the next few weeks.

Reduced Earnings Allowance

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to abolish the reduced earnings allowance.

Mr. Scott: The policy intention, as explained in "The Way Ahead", Cm. 917, January 1990 (copies of which are in the Library), is to provide for no new entitlements to reduced earnings allowance from the autumn of 1990.

Industrial Injuries

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the annual expenditure on the industrial injuries scheme in 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90.

Mr. Scott: The information is set out in the table.

Industrial Injuries Benefits[1] out-turn expenditure[2]

	£ million
1987-88	513
1988-89	514
[3]1989-90	535

[3] Provisional.

Benefits

Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was (i) the total number of recipients and (ii) the total sum spent in 1987-88, 1988-89 and 1989-90 on (a) disablement benefit, (b) reduced earnings allowance, (c) retirement allowance, (d) constant attendance allowance and (e) exceptionally severe disablement allowance.

Mr. Scott: The available information is in the table.

Industrial injuries benefit recipients[1,2]

	April 1988	April 1989
Disablement benefit	189,000	185,000
Reduced earnings allowance	151,000	147,000
Constant attendance allowance	2,000	2,000
Exceptionally severe disablement allowance	700	500

[1] The table shows the numbers of awards of each benefit on 2 April 1988 and 1 April 1989. These figures, and especially those for April 1989, have less than complete coverage, for example, because of late claims.
[2] The corresponding financial year expenditure figures are not available.

Savers (Interest)

Community Charge

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are his best estimates of the amount that will be saved in community charge benefit through the operation of the community charge transitional relief scheme.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 19 March 1990]: The community charge transitional relief scheme will reduce the total cost of community charge benefit by around £100 million to £2·5 billion on a full year basis and at 1990-91 benefit levels and prices.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Abattoirs

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he has taken to ensure the independence of veterinary officers charged with safeguarding animal welfare at abattoirs.

Mr. Maclean: Local authorities are responsible for enforcing the legislation to safeguard the welfare of animals at abattoirs. In addition, officers of the State Veterinary Service visit all abattoirs to monitor welfare standards and to give advice.

In so far as veterinary surgeons may have responsibilities in abattoirs, they are subject to the code of professional ethics of the Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons.

New Jobs, Newcastle

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the staff presently employed by the agricultural intervention board at Kenton Bar, Newcastle, are included in the 350 new jobs announced for Newcastle; and whether they will be expected to apply competitively for those jobs.

Mr. Curry: The work which is now being carried out at Kenton Bar will remain there and other functions will be transferred to the total of 350 jobs. The existing staff, who are employed on a temporary basis, will be invited to apply for these permanent jobs which will be advertised in the local newspapers in line with civil service rules on open and fair recruitment.

Farmers, Northumberland

Mr. Amos: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what benefit farmers in Northumberland will receive from the recent price fixing agreed by the EEC Agriculture Council of Ministers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: The settlement reached in Brussels last month was a very good one for the United Kingdom. In particular, we secured a substantial devaluation of the green pound which will increase sterling support prices for crops by 10·7 per cent., for beef by 8·5 per cent., for milk by 6·8 per cent. and for sheepmeat by 11 per cent.

Pigs

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the chemical components of recent contaminated pig feed.

Mr. Gummer: It is not possible to list all the components of the feed concerned. My Department has, of course, investigated those components which might be implicated in recent pig health problems.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is his estimate of the number of pigs which had been given feed contaminated with CYNOX 425 which had entered the food chain.

Mr. Gummer: My estimate would be none, on the basis that these pigs were adult sows newly weaned and some adult boars. The sows were between lactations and would only have been slaughtered for welfare reasons. The feedingstuffs company has confirmed that animals slaughtered for welfare purposes have not entered the food chain.

Intervention Board

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total number of posts to be transferred from the intervention board in Reading to Newcastle upon Tyne excluding posts already located in that city.

Mr. Curry: The work of the agency's external trade division, together with some common service support, will be transferred. The additional number of posts involved, excluding the 136 already located at the agency's Kenton Bar office, is expected to be about 220 jobs.

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what site or sites have been identified to accommodate staff transferred from the intervention board in Reading to Newcastle upon Tyne.

Mr. Curry: The intervention board is interested in a new building in the Newcastle business park but is considering a number of other office development sites.

Mineral Water

Mr. Barry Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps he is taking to ensure mineral water is correctly labelled.

Mr. Maclean: European Community rules on the labelling of natural mineral waters are contained in the Natural Mineral Waters Regulations 1985. Recent information that we have received regarding Perrier water has raised a number of questions about the labelling of this particular natural mineral water and whether it complies with the EC rules. I believe that the labelling does not comply with EC requirements and so we have raised the question with the European Commission and await its reply. The Government are firmly committed to the principle that labelling of any product should not be misleading to the consumer.

Whales

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) if he will make a statement on the Government's current policy on the hunting of whales and the Norwegian proposal to recommence the killing of Minke whales;

(2) what approaches he has had from the Norwegian authorities on their proposals to recommence the hunting of Minke whales;

(3) if he will make it his policy to block at the next international whaling conference the proposals by Norway to recommence the hunting of Minke whales; and if he will make a statement;

(4) if he will make a statement on his contacts with the Government of Norway over whaling.

Mr. Gummer: The United Kingdom played a leading role in achieving the current moratorium on commercial whaling agreed by the International Whaling Commission (IWC). In my view there can be no question of the moratorium being lifted unless and until the scientific advice is that whale stocks can be sustained at healthy levels and there is no likelihood of a species being endangered. I also consider that before there can be any consideration of resumption of commercial whaling, the IWC must develop a new management procedure to guarantee that there would be no repeat of the past history of over-exploitation. The moratorium is to be reviewed at the IWC's annual meeting this summer. If the assessments of the scientific committee, which are to be prepared for this IWC meeting, cannot confirm that the whale stocks are in a satisfactory position we will work hard for the moratorium to be continued.

Norway's recent action has been to request that the agenda of the forthcoming IWC meeting formally includes reconsideration of the protection stock classification of the north east Atlantic minke whale. The stock is already in the programme for a detailed comprehensive assessment at this year's meeting of the scientific committee of the IWC. The current classification means that even if there were no moratorium, this stock should not be exploited. A change in classification requires detailed assessment and evaluation by the scientific committee of the IWC in order for advice to be put to the Commission. This has yet to take place. As with the moratorium, I consider that no changes should be made without clear scientific advice as to the safety of the stock.

The Norwegian government are very aware of our views on whaling. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary made our position very clear when he met the Norwegian Fisheries Minister earlier this year. In addition we also have frequent contacts at official level under the umbrella of the work of the International Whaling Commission.

ENVIRONMENT

Environment Protection

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish details of centrally funded information proposed by his Department or by the Central Office of Information on his Department's behalf in each year since 1983 in respect of environment protection and countryside matters.

Mr. Chris Patten: Since 1983 my Department has funded, either directly or through COI, several hundred items of publicity and information on environmental protection and countryside matters. The main items are as follows:

[1] These items have been revised and/or reprinted in later years.

1990 Stand at "Green Show" at NEC in June; "Citizen and the Environment" leaflet.

During the same period my Department has produced several hundred items of information concerning environmental protection and countryside matters in the form of statutory instruments, circulars and priced publications, in addition to the publicity/information items already mentioned. The DOE's HQ Library already produces a comprehensive list of these in its annual list of publications.

Included in the publications category are parliamentary publications (such as Command Papers and House of Commons Papers), pollution papers, waste management papers, methods for the examination of waters and associated materials (MEWAM's), and annual publications such as the "Digest of Environmental Protection and Water Statistics" and the reports of the radioactive waste management advisory committee.

In addition to the regular items mentioned in paragraph 2 above, there are numerous ad hoc publications; an indication of which is given below:

1983 "Manual of Environmental Appraisal", "Disposal Facilities on Land of Low and Intermediate Level Radioactive Waste".

1984 "Independent Review of Disposal of Radioactive Waste at Sea", "Sponsored Research on Radioactive Waste", "Rayner Review on the Nature Conservancy Council", Circulars on "Green Belts", "Water and the Environment", and "Clean Air Acts".

1985 "Conservation on the Harp Seal and Hooded Seal", "Convention of the Conservation of European Wildlife and Natural Habitats", "Farm and Forestry Development in the National Parks", "Asbestos on Contaminated Land", "The Control of Organotins in Antifouling Paints", "The Control and Use of Marine Antifouling Paints", "Lead intakes of Young Children from Dust and Other Sources", "Monitoring of Beach Contamination following incident at BNFL Sellafield, Cumbria in November 1983".

1988 "The Effects of Acid Deposition on the Terrestial Environment in the UK", "Air Pollution in Great Britain", "The Effects of the Great Storm", "Protected Trees: A Guide to Preservation Procedures", "Possible impacts of Climate Change on the Natural Environment in the UK".

1989 "Endangered Species of Flora and Fauna", "Dioxins in the Environment", Command Paper on the Greenhouse Effect, "Our Common Future", "Keeping and Use of Radioactive Materials", "Radioactive Waste Management and Radioactivity in the Environment", "Guidance on Safeguarding the Quality of Public Water Supplies".

In addition to all items listed above, there are numerous reports resulting from research funded by the Department but not necessarily published by them; these are also listed in the Library's annual list.

Arrangements are being made for the House of Commons Library to receive future and back copies of the "Annual List of Publications" which is, at present, distributed to university libraries, local authorities, metropolitan councils and private sector companies.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest

Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will place in the Library a list of all sites of special scientific interest and areas of outstanding natural beauty, their exact reason for designation and their geographical location.

Mr. Trippier: A list of all areas of outstanding natural beauty, plus a map showing their geographical locations, can be found in the publication "Countryside Commission Annual Report 1988-89" which is already placed in the Library of the House.

This publication does not however, contain the criteria for designation, which is set out under section 87 of the National Parks and Access to the Countryside Act 1949 —also to be found in the Library of the House.

A list of SSSIs in England and Wales by county, was placed in the Library in August 1989. There are currently over 5,000 and it would be impracticable to place the reasons for their individual designation in the Library. The criteria for the designation of biological sites can be found in "Guidelines for Selection of Biological SSSI" which has been placed in the Library of the House.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Trotter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what have been the annual figures for toxic or hazardous waste arising in each of the last five years in (a) Tyne and Wear and (b) Cleveland; and in each case how much waste of this nature was disposed of (i) within the county, and by what means and (ii) by sea dumping.

Mr. Trippier: The figures on arisings and disposal of dangerous or difficult waste, which correspond to "special wastes" as defined by the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980, are provided annually to the Department by waste disposal authorites. For Cleveland and Tyne and Wear these are as follows:

[1] Includes 147,300 tonnes for sea disposal.
[2] Estimated figures; source HMIP.

Specific figures for disposal by type of facility are not held centrally. Waste disposal under licence at sea is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. However, Cleveland county council informs us that in 1988-89, 147,300 tonnes of waste were exported from the county for sea disposal.

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing how much toxic and hazardous waste was produced in the north-east region in each of the last five years, how much was disposed of locally, and how much was moved out of the region for disposal.

Mr. Trippier: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave earlier today to the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter).

The figures on arisings and disposal of dangerous or difficult waste, which correspond to "special wastes" as defined by the Control of Pollution (Special Waste) Regulations 1980, are provided annually to the Department by waste disposal authorities. For the purposes of this question I shall take the North East region to comprise the administrative areas of Cleveland, Durham, Northumberland and Tyne and Wear. The figures are as follows:

	1984-85	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89
(1) Arisings within the region (tonnes)	169,922	n.a.	270,050	368,293	583,724
(2) Deposits within the waste disposal area (tonnes)	209,367	n.a.	318,779	316,741	401,097
(3) Net export (difference between (1) and (2)) (tonnes)	−39,445	n.a.	−48,729	51,552	182,627

Local Government Finance

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish in the Official Report a list of local district councils indicating the multiplier that they are using for standard community charge on second properties.

Mr. Chope: This information is not yet available.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has any plans to end the exemption from charge capping for local authorities with budgets of less than £15 million.

Mr. Chris Patten: I am reviewing the operation of all aspects of the community charge and will make an announcement when decisions have been reached.

Mr. Gould: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will deposit in the Library, in respect of each charging authority, information on (a) the charging authority's demand on the collection fund, (b) the appropriation from and to their financial reserves, (c) income from specific and supplementary grants, (d) income from sales, fees, charges and other income, (e) gross revenue expenditure showing (i) capital charges net of capital financing grants, (ii) levies and (iii) unallocated contingencies, (f) estimated general and city fund revenue reserves at 1 April, (g) aggregate parish precepts and (h) other precepts, using the information provided by authorities on forms DAP1 and DAP2, corrected by his Department where necessary;

(2) if he will place in the Library information in respect of each collection fund on (a) total demands and precepts, (b) revenue support grant, (c) payments from NNDR pool, (d) safety net adjustment and special grants, (e) other adjustments, (f) amount of community charge income and (g) the average charge, using the information provided by authorities on forms DAP1 and DAP2, corrected by his Department where necessary;

(3) if he will place in the Library information in respect of each precepting authority on (a) aggregate of precepts on the collection funds, (b) appropriation from and to financial reserves, (c) net revenue expenditure, (d) income from specific and supplementary grants, (e) income from sales, fees, charges, interest receipts and other non-grant income, (f) gross revenue expenditure including (i) capital charges net of capital financing grants, (ii) levies and (iii) unallocated contingencies and (g) estimated general and county fund revenue reserves at 1 April, using the information provided by authorities on forms DAP1 and DAP2, corrected by his Department where necessary.

Mr. Chris Patten [holding answer 1 May 1990]: I am arranging for copies of the information to be placed in the Library of the House.

Information for some authorities is incomplete because not all authorities were required to complete lines 2 to 10 of the DAP1 and DAP2 returns, and in the event a number elected not to do so. The missing information will not be available until budget returns are received. When those later returns are received the information in these tables may need to be revised.

Mr. Boswell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what proportion of total community charges in England will be raised by (a) personal, (b) standard and (c) collective charges, respectively; and if he will list those English local authorities whose percentage raised by (b) and (c) jointly diverges up or down from the average by a factor of two or more.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 3 May 1990]: This information is not yet available.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local authorities which have community charge levels below £300, which have standard spending grants and other direct standard spending grants which exceed £400 per capita.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 3 May 1990]: The following authorities have set average community charges below £300 and receive more than £400 per head of relevant population in revenue support grant (net of the area safety net) and special grants (inner London education grant and low rateable value areas grants):

Barking and Dagenham
Bradford
Calderdale
City of London
Isles of Scilly
Kirklees
Lewisham
Tower Hamlets Wandsworth
Westminster

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will list in order of highest to lowest the poll tax charges levied by non-metropolitan district councils.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 4 May 1990]: I am arranging for this information to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing 20 per cent. of the poll tax in each local authority.

Mr. Chope [holding answer 4 May 1990]: I am arranging for this information to be placed in the Library of the House.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the reasons for the delay in providing his written answer of 3 May for the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East on local government revenue.

Mr. Chope: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to the hon. Member on 3 May explaining the position.

Monkton Cokeworks

Mr. Dixon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to provide a substantive response to the complaints made to him in November 1988 about the activities of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution in relation to Monkton cokeworks, Hebburn.
